

DELHI UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

DELHI UNIVERSITY LIBRARY

Cl. No. V3.28, K83 26

Ac. No. 1726-6 Date of release for loan

This book should be returned on or before the date last stamped below. An overdue charge of 0 6 nP will be charged for each day the book is kept overtime.

The London Library

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY
OF
EDWARD, LORD HERBERT
OF CHERBURY

The London Library

Autobiography of Lord Herbert of Cherbury. Edited by SIDNEY LEE.

Letters of Literary Men: Sir Thomas More to Robert Burns. Arranged and Edited by F. A. MUNBY.

Letters of Literary Men: Nineteenth Century. Arranged and Edited by F. A. MUNBY.

Life of Goethe. By G. H. LEWES.

Life of Shelley. By T. J. HOGG. With an Introduction by EDWARD DOWDEN.

Memoirs of the Life of Colonel Hutchinson. By his widow, LUCY HUTCHINSON. Edited by C. H. FIRTH.

Memoirs of William Cavendish, Duke of Newcastle, and Margaret his Wife. Edited by C. H. FIRTH.

The Interpretation of Scripture and other Essays. By BENJAMIN JOWETT.

LORD HERBERT OF CHERBURY.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF
EDWARD, LORD HERBERT
OF CHERBURY

WITH INTRODUCTION, NOTES, APPENDICES, AND A CONTINUATION OF THE LIFE

By SIDNEY LEE

Second Edition, Revised

LONDON
GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS LIMITED
NEW YORK: E. P. DUTTON & CO

PREFATORY NOTE

THIS edition of Lord Herbert of Cherbury's autobiography was prepared by me in 1886, and was published in the same year. For the purposes of the present re-issue, I have corrected such errors as have come to my knowledge during the twenty years interval, and I have introduced a few pieces of information which were not accessible to me when the work was originally undertaken.

SIDNEY LEE.

PREFACE TO THE ORIGINAL ISSUE (1886)

It may be of service to the reader to explain the arrangement of this volume. In the Introduction which precedes the Autobiography, I have attempted—firstly, to describe Lord Herbert's varied character, as displayed in his own writings and in historical records ; and secondly, to review his eminent achievements in literature and philosophy, of which he himself has given no account. In the essay which succeeds the Autobiography, I have tried to trace his political career in detail from 1624—the year when his own memoirs abruptly terminate—to 1648, the date of his death. In an appendix I have printed several original illustrative documents, many extracts from Herbert's unpublished correspondence, and some historical notes on topics to which frequent allusion is made in the Autobiography on the assumption—no longer justifiable—that they are matters of common knowledge. Former editors have treated the work as a mere curiosity of literature. I have endeavoured in my notes and elsewhere to prove that it deserves the serious attention of the student, not only of English literature, but of English social history in the early seventeenth century.

My text is that of the first printed edition issued from Horace Walpole's private press in 1764. I differ from that text alone in my treatment of proper names. Soon after I had set myself the task of identifying the persons mentioned by Lord Herbert, I came to the conclusion that the names had very often been wrongly transcribed, and my notes will, I trust, justify the changes I have made. Thus, on p. 27, I replace Tilesius by Telesius, on p. 30 Scordus by Cordus, on p. 62 William Crofts by William Crosse, and so forth. I greatly regret that I have been unable to consult the original manuscript, but my search for it, as I explain elsewhere, has proved unavailing.

viii Preface to the Original Issue (1886)

I have to thank the Earl of Powis, the Rev. T. Burd of Chirbury, and the Rev. Dr. Sewell, Warden of New College, Oxford, for the readiness with which they replied to the various inquiries I addressed to them while preparing the book. I also desire to acknowledge my obligations to M. de Rémusat's admirable little volume, Lord Herbert de Cherbury, sa Vie et ses Œuvres, and to the Archæological Collections published by the Powysland Club, which are invaluable to the student of Welsh history and biography.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
INTRODUCTION	xi
LORD HERBERT'S AUTOBIOGRAPHY	1
A CONTINUATION OF THE LIFE OF LORD HERBERT FROM 1624 TO 1648	135
APPENDIX :
I The Early History of the Herbert Family	167
Genealogical Table.	168-9
II Wales in the Sixteenth Century	171
III Walton's and Donne's Accounts of Lord Herbert's Mother	175
IV Duelling in France and England in the Seventeenth Century	179
V Lord Herbert's Quarrel with Lord Howard of Walden	182
VI Lord Herbert's Instructions at the French Court	186
VII Lord Herbert's Correspondence	188
INDEX	204

INTRODUCTION

'It would not be altogether absurd if a man were to thank God for his vanity among the other comforts of life'. Benjamin Franklin sets these words in the forefront of his autobiography, and they deserve to be set in the forefront of all successful works of the kind. A man may think to apply a record of his own life to various purposes. He may fashion it as a text-book of conduct for his children, as a history of his relations with the politics, religion, or literature of his time, as a generous panegyric of his friends, or as an ill-natured denunciation of those who have shared his life's successes or defeats. But from whatever point of view the successful autobiographer approaches his subject, unconsciously the same spirit moves him. He is convinced not merely that his life has been worth living, but that he has lived it to eminent advantage. He is self-centred; he is self-satisfied; he loves himself better than his neighbour; he weighs others in the balance, and finds them wanting; he knows himself to be of full weight. All professions to the contrary may safely be ignored. Absolute truthfulness is the last thing we expect of the successful autobiographer. No man can give an impartial estimate of himself; failure is only courted by attempting it, and success in autobiography is not attainable unless this condition receive practical recognition. But although 'vain opinions, flattering hopes, false valuations, imaginations as one would, and the like', are the salt of autobiography, sincerity of a kind we do require of it. The writer must be true to his own self-conceit. He must have no self-conscious misgivings about his own real value. The austere may condemn his attitude with what warmth they will. The man of human sympathies will give vanity fair quarter wherever he meet it, and no better reward for his forbearance can be promised him than the power of rightly appreciating that small circle of literature in which Lord Herbert's autobiography holds a central place.

The rigid moralist should devote himself to the 'poor shrunken things' of autobiography where the true autobiographical spirit is held in check, or whence it is altogether excluded. Let him not at any rate sit in judgment on the vainglorious performance of Lord Herbert of Cherbury. Mr Swinburne has claimed for this autobiography a place among the hundred best books of the world. On no other work of its class has the critic conferred similar rank. Questions of literary precedence can never hope for final answers, and there may be points of view from which this judgment is disputable. But it is doubtful if any other autobiography breathes quite as freely the writer's overweening conceit of his own worth, which is the primary condition of all autobiographical excellence. At every turn Lord Herbert applauds his own valour, his own beauty, his own gentility of birth. At home and abroad he flatters himself that he is the cynosure of neighbouring eyes. He, in fact, conforms from end to end to all the conditions which make autobiography successful. He is guilty of many misrepresentations. No defect is more patent in his memoirs than the total lack of a sense of proportion. Lord Herbert's self-satisfaction is built on sand. It is bred of the trivialities of fashionable life,—of the butterfly triumphs won in court society. He passes by in contemptuous silence his truly valuable contributions to philosophy, history, and poetry. But the contrast between the grounds on which he professed a desire to be remembered and those on which he deserved to be remembered by posterity, gives his book almost all its value. Men of solid mental ability and achievements occasionally like to pose in society as gay Lotharios; it is rare, however, for them to endeavour, even as autobiographers, to convey the impression to all succeeding generations that they were gay Lotharios and not much else besides. Yet it is such transparent errors of judgment that give autobiography its finest flavour.

Lord Herbert professes 'to relate to his posterity those passages of his life which he conceives may best declare him and be most useful to them'. He asserts that he writes 'with all truth and sincerity, as scorning to deceive or speak false to any'. When he took the work in hand he was more than sixty years old, and it was therefore fitting (he argued) that he should review his life so as to reform what was amiss and comfort himself with those actions 'done according to the rules of conscience, virtue, and honour'. No worthier object could he have proposed to himself in his declining years; yet so easily are autobiographers diverted from their avowed purposes, that with the exception of the notices of his very early life and a digression on education, there is no passage in the book which could serve any useful end in the hands of the 'young person'. There is nothing very interesting in the record of Lord Herbert's youth¹. Born on 3rd March 1583—twenty-two years after Bacon, and nineteen after Shakespeare—he was brought up in the luxury that became the eldest son of an old county family. He lost his father when he was thirteen or fourteen years old; was 'exceedingly inclined' to his studies and to music; and at the age of fifteen or thereabouts was married, while still at Oxford, to a wealthy cousin far older than himself, in accordance with an unromantic family arrangement, in which his own inclinations were not considered. Herbert was not a very spirited boy; and his mother, who took great pride in him, governed him and his wife rigorously during his minority. When approaching manhood he avoided 'the evil example' of other young men, but, in the closing years of Elizabeth's reign, 'curiosity rather than ambition' brought him to court. Then temptation spread its net for him for the first time, and he enjoyed the entanglement. He came to recognize that he was singularly handsome. Of swarthy complexion, he was often called the Black Lord Herbert. Queen Elizabeth suggested that it was a pity he should have married so young, and twice clapped him gently on the cheek, while he kissed her aged hands. He was one of a crowd of persons created Knight of the Bath at James I's coronation. 'I could tell', he remarks on this occasion, 'how much my person was commended by the lords and ladies that came to see the solemnity then used; but I shall flatter myself too much'—a tell-tale reservation—'if I believed it' (p. 44). He affected to take seriously the words of the formal oath, which bound him to defend all unprotected females, and he soon afterwards resolved to adopt the profession of knight-errantry. He had now, he boasts, lived with his wife in all conjugal loyalty for ten years, and had successfully resisted all allurements to the contrary. He was twenty-five years old, and deemed it desirable to see something more of the world. He told his wife that it became him to seek adventures 'beyond sea'. Mistress Herbert took another view of the situation, but her husband had his way, and in the next decade lived a very restless life.

¹ Enthusiastic admirer of the book—as was Horace Walpole, he told Mason that he had better skip the first fifty pages, and Montagu that the first forty pages would make him sick (Letters, iv, 156, 252). This is rather unfair to Lord Herbert; but the unique interest of the book is certainly not to be found in the early pages.

He went first to France; made friends with the Duc de Montmorency, an elderly French beau, and while staying at his attractive castle of Merlou tried to find occasion for his first duel in the playful endeavour of a French chevalier to take 'a knot of ribbon' from a little girl's head-dress. He rode the great horse, played the lute, and sang with great applause. He visited Henri IV at the Tuileries, and the King 'embraced him in his arms, and held him some while there'. The divorced Queen Margaret invited him to her balls, and gave him a place next her own chair, to the wonder and envy of the assembled company. He flirted with the Princess of Conti, who had a less than doubtful reputation. The ladies, however, did not confine their attention to him; they admired another man—one M. Balagni—who could not be thought at most but ordinary handsome', and the puzzling circumstance caused Lord Herbert no little disquietude.

Having tasted of foreign travel, Lord Herbert returned home, only to set out again on another expedition in Germany, where there was a prospect of war. The town of Juliers was to be besieged by Dutch, French, and English troops. No command was offered Herbert, and he performed no service of real importance in the campaign, although he hints at quite another conclusion. But he had the satisfaction of meeting M. Balagni again. He dared his gay rival to all manner of boyishly foolish escapades, in which he contrived that the Frenchman should come off second-best. But the exploit that made him most notorious in this campaign was a quarrel with Lord Howard of Walden. 'There was liberal drinking' one night in Sir Horace Vere's quarters, and Lord Herbert spoke merrily to his companions, so merrily that one of them, Lord Howard, an English officer, took offence, and came towards him 'in a violent manner'. Some days later Herbert's sensitive honour was wounded by a Frenchman's taunt that he had not demanded satisfaction of Lord Howard. He therefore sent him a challenge, and the duel would have been fought had not the principals been arrested before they met, and the childish dispute been stayed by the Lords of the Council. Such accidents invariably terminated Herbert's duels. Men of sense complained that he was choleric and hasty. He admitted that this, generally speaking, was true, but with appalling boldness he added, amid all manner of protestations, that he never had a quarrel with a man for his own sake; he often hazarded himself for his friends, but when injury was offered him in his own person, he sheathed his sword, and contented himself with an inward feeling of resentment. On his return to England he describes himself as carrying with him the reputation of a hero: 'And now, if I may say it without vanity, I was in great esteem both in court and city, many of the greatest desiring my company' (p. 68). The public generally had heard 'so many brave things' of him that his portrait, which he had had painted very many times, was in great demand¹. Ladies, from the Queen downwards, placed it in their cabinets or near their hearts, and gave occasion 'of more discourse' than he (modest man!) could have wished. One lady (Lady Ayres), 'a considerable person' according to Lord Herbert—although history has neglected her altogether—was discovered by the gallant, under circumstances reflecting little credit on himself (p. 69), looking upon his picture 'with more earnestness and passion than he could have easily believed'. He was the more surprised at her intense admiration of him, not because Lady Herbert was occupying any of his attention, but because at the moment his own affections were engaged by an anonymous beauty, whose attractions caused him real anxiety. But Lady Ayres' passion supplied him with congenial food for reflection until her husband treated him to a very uncomplimentary buffeting in Whitehall. In one place he protests before God that he had at court more favours (apparently of this kind) than he desired, but such, he consoles himself, are the penal ties attaching to the possession of rare manly beauty.

¹ Lord Herbert describes below three portraits of himself—1. (p. 45) in the robes of a Knight of the Bath, by an unknown artist (now at Powis Castle); 2. (pp. 59-60) mounted on a favourite horse; 3. (pp. 68-9) a picture painted by 'one Larkin,' of which Lord Herbert mentions several copies (of these one in miniature seems to be now at Charlotte and another is in the National Portrait Gallery, London). Isaac Oliver is credited with the original painting of Lord Herbert lying on the ground after a duel; an engraving of this picture, which is now at Powis Castle, formed the frontispiece to Horace Walpole's edition of the autobiography in 1764. There is at Penshurst Castle a fifth portrait of Lord Herbert, attributed to Oliver.

To a volatile nature like Lord Herbert's, strong passion was altogether foreign. At the best of times his wife received from him conjugal loyalty; true love did not enter into their relations with one another; the lover's fleeting raptures were excited in him by other women's charms. So far as his autobiography informs us, he had no near and dear friends. Affability he had in plenty, but affability is not a staple commodity, and is a poor substitute for the enduring virtue of friendship. Aurelian Townsend, his companion on his first journey, and Ned Sackville, whom he travelled with later, proved pleasant company for a while, but he soon wearied of them and sought new associates. Sir Robert Harley, 'being then my dear friend', was once insulted in his presence, and the insult was promptly resented by Lord Herbert, who in spite of weak health drew his sword upon the offender. But the story in Lord Herbert's mouth merely becomes a new testimony to his own adventurous disposition. He was good-natured in his dealings with his social inferiors, as is usually the case with the vainglorious. Richard Griffiths, his servant, found him a kindly master. He generously used his influence with Count Maurice of Nassau to spare the life of a soldier who had killed his companion, and he recounts the circumstance for the most part attractively; but he spoils the effect of the narration by finally making the Count address all the high officers of the camp in the words: 'Do you see this cavalier, with all that courage you know, hath yet that good-nature to pray for the life of a poor soldier?' Lord Herbert clearly infers that his generosity, like his amours, added something to his own reputation. He shows himself more disinterested in his affection for his horses, which he rode to advantage; he lamented their sickness, entrusted them to careful keeping in his absence from home, and left provision for them in his will.

Lord Herbert found the sowing of the wild oats which he had neglected to sow in early youth a satisfying pastime in manhood, and did not lightly relinquish the recreation. In 1614 he reappeared in the Low Countries. The Spaniards under Spinola were in the field against the Dutch. Herbert and the Dutch commander (Count Maurice of Nassau) were now the best of friends, and when the fighting was interrupted they played chess with each other, or discussed horses. The Count also made Herbert his companion in his love-making, and 'yet so that I saw nothing openly (the modest autobiographer apologizes) more than might argue a civil familiarity'. On one occasion Herbert wanted to decide the dispute between the Dutch and the Spaniards by challenging a Spanish champion in the name of his mistress to single combat, but this romantic ambition was promptly suppressed by his friends. Spinola's high reputation led Herbert, although associated with a hostile camp, to seek an introduction to him; Boswell was not more eager to introduce himself to famous men. Herbert, therefore, walked across to the Spanish quarters, caught the General at dinner, sat down beside him, and on taking his leave, offered to fight under him, if he ever led an army against the infidel Turk. Immediately afterwards Herbert's military ardour cooled, and he visited the notable towns of Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, paying and receiving high-flown compliments all along the route. He twice visited the Elector-Palatine and his wife at Heidelberg. At Rome the master of the English College received him hospitably, because (Herbert is careful to remind us) he had heard men oftentimes speak of him 'both for learning and courage'. On the return journey he spent much time in Savoy, where the Duke and his minister Scarnafissi had also heard that he was a cavalier of great worth, and treated him accordingly. He promised to raise a troop of horse in Languedoc in behalf of the Duke, who was engaged in war with Spain. On the journey to Languedoc he went out of his road to see the daughter of an innkeeper, who (he had been told), was the handsomest woman in Europe, and the sight was peculiarly refreshing. Like adventures accompanied him until his arrival in England in 1618, when the Duke of Buckingham suddenly chose him to go as English ambassador to France.

The responsibility of office somewhat sobered him, and he performed his diplomatic duties with energy and discretion. He lived at Paris in great state, as befitted, in his opinion, the representative of a great nation; spent far more than his salary or his private resources justified, and was jealous of his privileges. By an eccentric ruse he asserted his right to have precedence of the Spanish ambassador in court ceremonies. It goes without saying that he continued his gallantries at the French court. He was, in fact, in such robust health, that he was disposed (he tells us) to some follies which he afterwards repented. He comforted his conscience, however, with the knowledge that he was neither intemperate nor deceitful in his pleasures, and that he could, an' he would, extenuate his fault by telling circumstances that would have operated adversely on the most sober-minded of men. His repartees were of course the delight of French society, and he was a universal favourite. The only person who did not make himself agreeable to him was M. de Luynes, the French king's favourite. Luynes was a man of low breeding, and was little likely to be influenced by Lord Herbert's graces of demeanour. When, therefore, Luynes supported a policy of aggression against the French Protestants, and Herbert, in accordance with his instructions, remonstrated on their behalf, the two soon came to high words. Luynes sent a special messenger to James I to complain of his representative's misconduct, and Herbert followed to explain matters. Herbert suggested that he should fight Luynes, but James I did not take kindly to the proposal, although he was satisfied with Herbert's explanations. On Luynes' death in 1621, Herbert returned to the French court, and remained there till the early months of 1624, when he was suddenly and permanently recalled. In the closing years of his embassy Herbert showed himself to real advantage ; he used all his influence at Paris in behalf of the Protestant Elector-Palatine, the titular King of Bohemia ; he sought to cement an alliance between England and France as opposed to Spain, and to consolidate the union of England and Holland. But with the bitter disappointment of his recall his autobiography comes to an abrupt termination.

Lord Herbert's lack of strict veracity, which I have already laid to his charge, is not a defect with which he has been previously credited. Horace Walpole judged him to be the incarnation of truthfulness ; but Walpole applied no tests, and saved himself trouble by his willingness to be deceived. Herbert, of course, is no common liar. With plausible amiability he suppresses the truth rather than commits deliberate perjury. When he is detected his purpose looks so innocent or so aimless that the lover of autobiography will mercifully attribute some of his inaccuracies to the failure of a sexagenarian's memory. But failure of memory is not always a satisfactory theory. The most significant misstatements in Herbert's autobiography occur in the early pages. There Lord Herbert has not only his own but his forefathers' reputation to maintain, and he sets his shoulder valiantly to the wheel. There is a picturesque description of the founder of his own branch of his family, Sir Richard Herbert of Colebrook. Sir Richard and his brother (the first of the Herberts to be created Earl of Pembroke) bore themselves bravely in Edward IV's behalf at Hedgecote Field in 1469. Lord Herbert's glowing story of their noble deeds passes with startling abruptness into an account of their tombs. He discreetly omits to mention that his great-great-grandfather and his great-great-grand-uncle were taken prisoners on the battlefield, and beheaded at Northampton. Their death was not disgraceful, but a well-developed sense of respectability apparently forbids the mention of the ghastly detail. Lord Herbert makes many genealogical errors, and such errors are usually excusable whenever and by whomsoever they may be made. But there is method visible in Herbert's madness on these points. He overlooks intervening heirs and heiresses, so that he may show that the cousin who became his wife was maliciously deprived of much of her inheritance, and that he had a share of suffering in her wrongs, all of which is purely imaginary¹. Of his widowed mother he tells us less than her maternal care of him deserved. She was living throughout the years covered by the autobiography, and Herbert acquaints us with some circumstances of her declining days, but he forgets to notice that she married a second time. It was a strange marriage, and could not easily have been forgotten. She, a thoughtful woman over forty years old, was wedded to a youth (Sir John Danvers) less than half her age; but Donne tells us that the disparity bred no unhappiness—that the union fostered the fullest harmony. Yet Herbert, the lady's eldest son, leaves all this unsaid; he declines to tread on such delicate ground; and when he has occasion to refer to his stepfather by name, gives no hint of the relationship. Other kindly protectors fare no better at his hands. Donne, his mother's friend and his own counsellor throughout his youth, is barely mentioned¹. Sir George More of Losely, who, as it happens, became involuntarily Donne's father-in-law, was Herbert's guardian after his father's death. Extant letters prove Herbert's boyish liking for Sir George²; but not only is his name blotted out of the autobiography—a circumstantial story is introduced to show that his uncle, Sir Francis Newport, was the guardian of his minority, and poor Sir George's many acts of kindness are assigned to others. Ben Jonson and Selden, both lifelong acquaintances, are similarly ignored³. For many years Herbert's right to Montgomery Castle was successfully disputed by his kinsman, Shakespeare's William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, but here again all is silence in Herbert's memoirs. If the reader place by the side of Lord Herbert's account of his ridiculous quarrel with Lord Howard of Walden the correspondence and account given by Lord Howard's second⁴, he will note very strange discrepancies. Lord Herbert does not tell us (although his letters prove it) that he was a party to a formal public reconciliation, and immediately afterwards sent a private challenge; neither would it please him did he know

¹ See p. 9.

¹ Donne had the highest opinion of Herbert, and encouraged him in his studies and in his love of books. Cf. Donne's Letter—No. lvi.—to Herbert sent with a copy of his Biothanasos, and Donne's poem addressed to Herbert 'at the siege of Juliers', first printed in the 1633 quarto of Donne's poems, pp. 82-4. Herbert wrote an elegy on Donne (d. 1631) which appears among his poems.

² See Appendix vii.

³ The earliest proof of Selden's intimacy with Herbert is a very friendly note addressed to him under date 3d February 1629-30 (Brit. Mus. MS. Addit. 32,092, f. 314); the latest proof is the appearance of Selden's name as an executor in Herbert's will. To Ben Jonson Herbert dedicated his Satyra Secunda, and he eulogized Jonson in some very complimentary lines prefixed to Jonson's translation of Horace's Ars Poetica. Ben returned the compliment in the following:

If men get name for some one virtue, then,
What man art thou, that art so many men,
All-virtuous Herbert! on whose every part
Truth might spend all her voice, fame all her art?
Whether thy learning they would take or wit,
Or valour, or thy judgment seasoning it,
Thy standing upright to thyself, thy ends
Like straight, thy piety to God and friends:
Their latter praise would still the greatest be,
And yet they, all together, less than thee.

Another of Herbert's poetic acquaintances was Thomas Carew, who went with him to Paris (see p. 102). On p. 106 Thomas Carew is disguised in earlier editions, through mistranscription, as Thomas Caage. Herbert has a reference to 'my witty Carew' in his elegy on Donne.

⁴ See Appendix v.

that posterity had convinced itself, in spite of all his protestations to the contrary, that he never set foot in the place appointed for the duel. In France he would have us infer that from the first he saw through Luynes' mean character, yet in his private correspondence, penned during the first years of their acquaintance, he praises Luynes without reserve. And in spite of the political foresight on which he plumes himself, with some justice in the last years of his embassy, he overlooks the rise of Richelieu, the most notable fact in contemporary French history ¹.

The reader will recognize that to attain a complete conception of Lord Herbert's character he must not solely confine his attention to the autobiography. It deals with a fragment of Lord Herbert's life, and imperfectly with that fragment. It offers us testimony that for purposes of serious criticism needs corroboration and amplification. To arrive at a final estimate we must probe many topics which are barely alluded to in the memoirs; the details of the last years of Lord Herbert's life, which are untouched by his memoirs, must be consulted; and we must appraise the evidence of mental and imaginative capacity offered us in his philosophical speculations and in his poetry.

Lord Herbert's public life in the years covered by his autobiography was a triumphal progress; it was almost without shadow. His public life in after years is a dreary series of disasters. It is indeed regrettable that Lord Herbert should have lacked the opportunity, or rather (it may be) the disposition, to pen the record of his misfortunes. The extant letters and papers written by him in his decline, show that defeat and disgrace did not destroy his self-conceit. But the effort to sustain the same self-satisfaction under stress of perplexing difficulties as in the face of smiling fortune, must have exercised all his ingenuity, and would have probably proved the most heroic instance on record of the sustaining power of vanity. The facts of his later life, which, in the absence of any connected presentation of them from his own pen, form no very pleasing picture, are soon told. He was suddenly dismissed from the French embassy; the abruptness of his dismissal ruined his political reputation; and although he petitioned James I, and subsequently Charles I, again and again for compensation, he found all avenues to dignified office closed to him¹. 'I ever loved my book and a private life more than any busy preferments', he writes with curious inconsistency near the close of his autobiography. He certainly did not yield to his exclusion from political place without a struggle, in which other men would have been conscious of painful humiliation. In season and out of season, he pressed for a hearing. In plain, unvarnished terms he pointed out the besotted blindness of neglecting such political merit as his. As long as Buckingham lived he clung tenaciously to his former patron; he sought Charles's favour as Buckingham's friend, and, to flatter the king, defended the favourite from unfriendly critics after he was laid in his grave. He was rewarded for his pains, not with high office, as he desired, but with the cheapest of all honours of the time—an Irish and an English peerage. Buckingham's murder practically deprived Herbert of all hold on the court, and with characteristic versatility he laboured for his end through new channels. He set himself to write a history of the reign of Henry VIII, in which Charles I's ancestor was to appear as a man of virtue, and the Reformation the apotheosis of righteousness. He really took little interest in either subject, as he confessed to the Papal legate, but, time out of mind, he tried to impress the King with his disinterested enthusiasm in taking up the work. Doles of money and grants of disused apartments in royal palaces were occasionally flung to him in answer to the petitions in which he lauded himself and his achievements past and to come. But unmistakable marks of royal recognition never reached him. He certainly deserved these as well as any diplomatist of the day, but under the Stuarts, within and without the court, no man got his deserts. At length the Civil War grew imminent, and Herbert feigned at first the enthusiasm of a staunch Royalist. He took advantage of a general invitation to join the King's Council at York in 1640, and protested against the bare thought of conceding any demand to the enemies of the Crown. But a new generation of courtiers had arisen since he played a really prominent part in court society, and none heeded his words. He retired to ¹ I have given a detailed account of Herbert's later public life on pp. 135-163.

¹ Minor inaccuracies are illustrated by Herbert's contradictory statements as to his own age (p. 15). He represents himself to have been two years younger than was the fact at the date of his marriage.

Montgomery Castle in dudgeon, pondered his grievances, assumed a cynical indifference to the current party divisions, and resolved to suffer as little personal inconvenience from the war as possible. At the same time as the Parliament gave him a taste of its growing power, and threatened him with the confiscation of his property, Rupert, his sovereign's nephew, and the son of that Electress-Palatine to whom he had been in earlier years chivalrously attached, came to Shrewsbury. The Prince asked for his aid, and for an interview, and offered to put his castle in a state of defence. Lord Herbert replied by letter that he could defend himself; that he disliked soldiers about the house; and that he had just entered on a new course of physic which would forbid his meeting the Royalist leader. Soon afterwards the Parliamentary general in the district invited him to surrender; he hesitated for a day or two; found the prospect of resistance uncongenial, and assented to the demand. He remained joint-master of his castle with the Parliamentarians, and the Royalists straightway laid siege to it. His new friends relieved him, and he put himself wholly in their hands. He went to London, lived to all outward appearance on the happiest of terms with the Parliament men, received a substantial pension from them, pursued his philosophical studies, grew irritable in temper, declined in health, and died in 1648 at the age of sixty-five. Before his death he wrote a long series of epitaphs upon himself, in which he announced his belief in the soul's immortality, and his anticipations of a happier life hereafter. His sons and all surviving relatives remained true to their Royalist colours to the last, and lost everything in the struggle. Lord Herbert saved his property at the expense of his honour, and clearly had a poor opinion of those who reversed the process. He showed some sense of parental responsibility in making before his death pecuniary provision for his children. His theoretical devotion to military pursuits also received illustration in his will, where he promised a pension in perpetuity to two wounded soldiers, to be chosen by his younger son—a Royalist captain, and these pensioners were to stand permanently, fully armed, at the gates of Montgomery Castle. He asked the Parliament, with characteristic complacency, to pay the arrears of his pension to his elder son and heir, to enable the young man to discharge the large fine inflicted on him for his consistent devotion to his sovereign. At the date of his death Lord Herbert had renounced the political ambitions which had distracted him for the first fifty years and more of his life. His political temperament belonged, in fact, to an earlier epoch—to the reign of Elizabeth, in which politicians were true to none but themselves; and such a temperament was ill adapted for a crisis that involved great political principles. The vanity and harmless peculiarities of his earlier life were misinterpreted by a generation that had not known him as a young man, and they consequently degenerated into an absorbing selfishness and confirmed eccentricities of conduct. Herbert's old age lacked 'honour, love, obedience, troops of friends', and in their stead came curses both loud and deep. It was overlooked that he was a vainglorious man, disappointed, through little fault of his own, of the worldly successes he loved, or that outside politics he had laid the foundation of a real and lasting reputation.

And here let us part with Lord Herbert in the rôle of courtier and politician. Let us glance at him now in his study, when he has closed the door on the distractions of court or political life. The change is a striking one. Apologetic tones are no more needed. The fashionable man of pleasure is one no longer. The near-sighted politician, whose political horizon was limited by hopes of his own advancement, becomes a far-seeing philosopher. In the solitude of his library the frivolous worldling faces boldly the problems of human life; seeks the final cause of the processes of the human mind, and brings all religious systems to the test of reason. He accepts no man's judgment in place of his own; he passes by all acknowledged contemporary authorities, and anticipates opinions and methods that are junior to him by at least two centuries. The nature of truth is the central theme of his earliest speculations, and he is the only Englishman who has devoted a large treatise to a purely metaphysical treatment of the topic. The relations of abstract truth with religion next absorbed his attention, and he was the first to seek a conception of the essentials of religion by applying the comparative method to all the systems with which he was able to acquaint himself. Such are the labours of the man who pretended that his autobiography recorded all the achievements to which posterity ought to attach a serious value.

Lord Herbert gives two or three passing hints in his autobiography that he had in his leisure moments dabbled in philosophy, but it is so difficult and so dangerous to take him seriously in his memoirs, that the reader who confines himself to that part of his work alone, will altogether misjudge him on these points. As soon as he could speak without fear of imperfection or impertinence in his utterances, he worried himself and his nurses (he tells us) with speculations as to how he had come into the world, and how he should go out of it. In the general digression on education which figures somewhat inaptly in the early pages of the book, Herbert contemns the subtleties of logic as being 'only tolerable in a mercenary lawyer', and recommends the pupil to devote himself solely to that part of the science which will enable him to detect fallacies in 'vicious argumentations'. 'Some good sum of philosophy . . . which may teach him both the ground of the Platonic and Aristotelian philosophy', should be acquired subsequently; it will not be amiss to learn the 'Paracelsian principles', and the arguments controverting 'the ordinary Peripatetic doctrine'. But all this, Lord Herbert adds, in a characteristically light-hearted vein, 'may be performed in one year; that term being enough for philosophy, as I conceive, and six months for logic, for I am confident a man may have quickly more than he needs of these arts'. At the close of the memoirs Herbert shyly confesses to the reader his love of books and of a private life, and adds with conscious pride that he was an author himself. He had begun a book in England, and had continued it in France in the intervals of flirtation and negotiation. He had shown his handiwork to two great scholars, Grotius and Tilenus, who, 'after they had perused it, and given it more commendations than is fit for me to repeat, exhorted me earnestly to print and publish it'. The title of the book—De Veritate prout distinguitur a Revelatione verisimili, possibili et à falso—alone raises the suspicion that Lord Herbert is not speaking in his usual manner, or that the bases of truth had all along divided his attention with the frivolities of society. But it is necessary to turn to the book itself to realize the significance of these suggestions.

It is only desirable to point out here the salient features of Lord Herbert's philosophy—to treat it as evidence of his reflective and dialectical power, and of the note of seriousness in his mental constitution. Lord Herbert writes in Latin 'Libere philosophemur . . . Veritatem sine dote quæramus', he says in an opening address to the reader, and the appeal characterizes the whole work. Lord Herbert attacks his subject without delay. He lays down as an axiom that truth exists, and thence deduces a series of propositions as to its permanence, its universality, and the general capacity of the mind to perceive truth. His theory of perception is very hazily expressed, and is practically ignored in the latter part of the treatise; but the fact that he should have introduced such a theory at all is proof of the thoroughness of his method and the sincerity of his aims. The mind, he says, consists of an almost infinite number of what he terms 'faculties', and each thing has a form corresponding to one of these 'faculties'. Whenever a thing is brought into contact with the mind, the corresponding faculty becomes active, immediately conforms to the thing, and the harmonious conforming of the one with the other (intellectus cognoscentis cum re cognita congruentia) establishes a perception of truth. Thus the mind is no tabula rasa, or blank book, on which objects inscribe themselves; it is rather a closed book, only opened on the presentation of objects. But although the 'faculties' of the mind are as numerous as things, and there is thus a virtual analogy between the human mind and the world, the mental 'faculties' may be roughly reduced to four great classes, to which Herbert gives the titles—Natural Instinct, Internal Sense, External Sense, and Discursus, or Reason¹. And here (so far as I understand the system) Lord Herbert deviates a little from his old path, and makes no attempt to maintain strictly his original theory of perception. He discusses at length Natural Instinct, his first class of faculties, which might more justly be designated Intellectual Instinct: it closely corresponds to the Aristotelian νοῦς, the Schoolmen's Intelligentia, the common sense of other philosophy, and the light of nature of popular parlance. It is the source of the common notions, primary truths, common principles (κοινὰ ἐννοιαί, notiæ communes), which exist in every human being of sound and entire mind. These notions are not the product of experience or observation ; they are intuitions. External objects may excite them in us, but do not convey them to us : they are implanted in us at our birth ; they come direct from God ; they are the part of the divine image and the divine wisdom with which every human being is impregnated. Lord Herbert carefully defines their distinguishing qualities ; they have the priority of all other kinds of notions ; they are established independently of all secondary considerations supplied by the conscious exercise of reason ; they invite such universal consent that to deny them is to abnegate human nature ; they are necessary to the conversation of mankind. The other three classes of faculties act under the direction of the natural or intellectual instinct. The 'internal sense' distinguishes the agreeable from the disagreeable, and good from evil ; it is identical with the conscience. The 'external sense' is nothing more than what is commonly known as sensation. The 'discursive faculty' determines the relations between the various conceptions produced by the other sets of faculties : it deals with quiddity, quality and quantity, time and space. Herbert finally insists that man's capacity for religion distinguishes him from animals rather than reason.¹

¹ Sir William Hamilton calls the last head 'the discursive faculty'; Hallam calls it 'reason'; M. de Rémusat 'raisonnement'.

Herbert's religious views show as striking an originality as his purely philosophical speculations. He develops them in the concluding sections of the De Veritate as well as in two treatises—*Religio Laici*² and *De Religione Gentilium*³—which practically form appendices to the work on Truth. His doctrine, briefly expressed, runs thus :—Religion is common to the human race. Stripped of accidental characteristics, and reduced to its essential form, it consists of five notiæ communes, or innate ideas, which spring from the natural instinct. The common notions are—(1.) That there is a God. (To confirm the existence of a God, Herbert relies on the argument of design in the created world, and he anticipates Paley in illustrating his argument by the example of a watch)¹. (2.) That He ought to be worshipped. (3.) That virtue and piety are essential to worship. (4.) That man ought to repent of his sins. (5.) That there are rewards and punishments in a future life. It is unnecessary and unreasonable to admit any articles of religion other than those. The dogmas of the Churches, reputed to embody divine revelations, are the work of priests, who have endeavoured to establish their own influence for their own advantage by shrouding these five ideas in obscurely worded creeds. To prove the universality of these ideas, Herbert submits the religion of the Gentiles to an historical examination, and adduces the testimony of Seneca and Plato, of Cicero, Lucretius, and Ovid to show that the religious belief of the Greeks and Romans, when stripped of sacerdotal superstition, is identical with his five articles. Certain of the articles in fact maintained a purer shape in the ancient than in the modern world. Death and a future life were more vividly and profitably realized by the believers in Elysium and Tartarus than by those who christened the hereafter Heaven and Hell. Aristotle has defined the common notions of virtues more effectively than any other writer. Thus revealed religion is practically rejected by Lord Herbert as the artifice of an hierarchy. Moreover, no one form of revealed religion receives universal assent; every form of it is matter of endless controversy: no one form of it, therefore, can be true, since universality of assent is one of the axiomatic conditions of truth. Any theory of revelation which represents God to have repeatedly favoured one part of the human race, to the exclusion of all the rest of it, is demonstrably inconsistent with the notion of the divine attributes, inculcated by the natural instinct.

¹ Two elaborate accounts of Lord Herbert's philosophic system and religious views have been published on the continent. M. de Rénusat gives an admirable sketch of the subject in his Lord Herbert, sa Vie et ses Œuvres, Paris, 1874, pp. 120-212. A somewhat fuller exposition may be found in Eduard Lord Herbert von Cherbury Ein kritischer Beitrag zur Geschichte des Psychologismus und der Religions-philosophie, von Dr. C. Güttler. Munich, 1897. Sir William Hamilton has briefly described the characteristic features of Herbert's philosophy in his Notes on Reid's Philosophy of Common Sense (Reid's Works, ed. Hamilton, ii, pp. 781, 782). Ueberweg touches on it in his History of Philosophy, ii, 34, 40, and in the Appendix to the English translation (ii, 354, 355) an elaborate notice is to be found. Though translated into French in 1639, the De Veritate has never appeared in English (see bibliography on p. 134).

² This treatise was published in London for the first time in 1645, together with an appendix to the De Veritate, entitled De Causis Errorum, an exposition of the logical fallacies. The Religio Laici occupies twenty-seven pages at the close of the work, and is followed by an Appendix Ad Sacerdotes de Religione Laici and three Latin poems, two of which are reprinted in the autobiography. Another edition of the volume was issued in 1656.

³ This work was published posthumously at Amsterdam in 1663 (2d edit. 1700). It was translated into English by W. Lewis in 1709. This is the only English version of any of Lord Herbert's philosophical writings.

¹ 'Et quidem si horologium per diem et noctem integram horas signanter indicans viderit quispiam non mente captus, id consilio arteque summa factum judicaverit. Equis non plane demens, qui hanc mundi machinam non per viginti quatuor horas tantum, sed per tot secula clementis suos obeuntem animadverterit, non id omne sapientissimo utique potentissimoque alicui auctori tribuat?'—De Religione Gent., cap. xiii. The idea has been traced to Cicero, De Natura Deorum, ii, 31. It is to be found in many writers intermediate between Paley and Herbert.

But to test reputed revelation we must not rely upon the faculty of natural instinct, but on the discursive faculty. We must examine the character and condition of the person to whom the revelation is presumably made, and this examination is to be conducted on such searching lines that no received revelation answers the test. With some inconsistency Lord Herbert adds that the only revelation that a man can reasonably accept as true is one made immediately to himself, and so far is he from denying the possibility of this kind of personal revelation, that he solemnly asserts in his autobiography that when he was hesitating as to whether he ought to publish his treatise on Truth, God gave him a direct sign of approval, on which he acted ¹. In his Religio Laici, and its appendix Ad Sacerdotes, priesthoods are generally denounced, and Lord Herbert explains his attitude towards Christianity. He takes up the neutral position—that it is the best religion because it is most readily reducible to the five essential articles. He sees in its rites an endeavour to give prominence to the common notions of religion, but he renounces its claim to a special revelation and all sympathy with those professors of Christianity who believe themselves to be in any wise specially favoured by God—‘the impious enemies of the universal Divine Providence’. Lord Herbert insists, that whatever form of religion a virtuous man adopt, or whatever government he live under, he will obtain inward peace now and eternal happiness hereafter.

Ethics do not enter very materially into Lord Herbert's philosophy, and in his sparse references to the subject, he inclines, in spite of his eulogies of virtue, to a lax system of morals. He does not set himself up, he reminds us, as an apologist for wicked men, but sin (he argues) is very often attributable to hereditary physical causes, to an inherent and irresistible propensity to vice, which invites a very mild censure from rational beings. Lord Herbert holds the sanguine belief that none are so wicked as to sin purposely, and with an high hand, against the eternal majesty of God ². He urges men to pass over injuries done to themselves, because a great and good God will hereafter assign double punishment to those aggressors who do not suffer for their aggressions in this world¹. But while he treats ethics loosely and unsystematically, Herbert insists on the high importance of education. The only obviously serious passages in the autobiography are those devoted to an exposition of an educational system which has much of Milton's loftiness of aim and Locke's sober sense². Hereditary disease must be counteracted in infancy; manners are as important as learning, 'for among boys all vice is easily learned'; Greek should be studied before Latin; the logic of the Schools should not occupy much of the pupil's time, nor should philosophy nor mathematics; the rudiments of medical and botanical and ethical science should be at the command of all men, and athletic exercises must never be neglected. Botany Herbert especially commends as 'a fine study': 'it is worthy a gentleman to be a good botanic, that so he may know the nature of all herbs and plants, being our fellow-creatures and made for the use of man'³. Herbert was not quite satisfied that he had treated education with adequate fulness in his autobiography. 'I confess', he writes there⁴, 'I have collected many things to this purpose which I forbear to set down here, because, if God grant me life and health, I intend to make a little treatise concerning these points'. This 'little treatise' was written later, and after remaining long in an anonymous manuscript, was printed with Lord Herbert's name in 1768, under the title of A Dialogue between a Tutor and a Pupil. Its authorship is assuredly proved by internal evidence⁵, but its purpose is less practical than might be expected. After the tutor has appraised the value of various studies, in which botany holds, as before, a high place, the pupil asks why, in matters of religion, priests should advise him to rely on faith rather than on reason? The tutor replies by pointing out the

¹ Page 134, infra, and see also the account of Lord Herbert's death on p. 161. Herbert believed in the efficacy of prayer, and a prayer of his, expressing his gratitude to God for having given him a knowledge of His greatness, is published in Warner's Epistolary Curiosities. Herbert's will opens with a bequest of ‘my rational soul, with all its divine faculties, being, understanding, will, faith, hope, love, and joy to God, my creator, redeemer, and preserver’.

² 1'p.33, infra.

¹ P. 33, infra.

² Pp. 23-43, infra.

³ P. 31, infra. Herbert's medical knowledge, of which he gives several examples below (pp. 28-30), is derived from the works of Paracelsus and his disciples. My friend, Dr Norman Moore, points out to me that it is of no scientific value whatever, and has the worst defects of empiricism.

⁴ Pp. 43, infra.

⁵ See the notes on pp. 27, 31, 39, 43. Abraham Sellar presented the MS. in 1704 to Dr Woodward. It subsequently passed into the hands of Colonel King, Dr Woodward's executor, and thence apparently to W. Bathoe, the bookseller, who published it in 1768. The MS. is now in the Bodleian Library.

evils of an irrational faith, brings the argument round to Lord Herbert's five points of religion, and corroborates them by an examination of Christian and heathen theology. This 'little treatise', therefore, though professedly an appendix to Lord Herbert's educational disquisition in his autobiography, is virtually a final restatement of his religious position. But it is of value as positively proving the author's earnest desire to supplant the received religious teaching by free and unrestricted thought in the minds of young as well as of old men.

Lord Herbert's treatment of philosophy and cognate themes is not without defect. In his purely metaphysical works his diction is obscure where precision is least dispensable¹; wire-drawn distinctions are made between terms and propositions which are for all practical purposes identical, and the author excludes all illustration of his meaning from matters of common knowledge. In the discussion of his five points of religion, he often falls a victim to the theological bias which he so severely denounces in others. His deduction of a future life from the natural instinct which prompts men to imagine its existence, is only worthy of the professed theologian, and much else of his reasoning on religious topics is obviously circular. But the defects are few compared with the undoubted merits of Lord Herbert's achievement. He has the greatest virtue of all speculative writing, the virtue of originality. He had read such books as were accessible to him on the subjects with which he dealt. None of them satisfied him, and rejecting all their conclusions, he worked the questions they professed to answer out for himself. No authority, he said, deserved a slavish adherence. A philosopher must think for himself, and have no personal nor professional ends to serve. He must be *ingenuus et sui arbitrii*². This in itself was a sure sign that Herbert was a sincere progressionist. The idol of authority was still worshipped by the mass of his contemporaries, but he resolutely set his face against it. Not the least important part of his work is his dignified and rational plea for universal toleration in matters of religious belief.

It is somewhat characteristic of his temper that Herbert

¹ Herbert apologizes for sphalmata et errata at the close of the De Veritate, and asks the reader to correct them for himself. Hallam is especially severe on him for his obscurities of terminology.

² De Veritate is dedicated Lectori cuius integri et illibati iudicii.

should have made no mention of Bacon in his philosophical works, and have regarded himself as the one man of the age who dared to think for himself. In the whole of his writings there is but a single reference to the greatest of contemporary thinkers. Herbert confesses that he followed Bacon's example in turning his attention to the history of Henry VIII; but although he admits that his model—Bacon's Life of Henry VII—was a performance that did honour to its author, and that its author was 'a great personage', he affects to be more depressed by Bacon's disgraceful end than impressed by his literary achievements¹. Bacon was the friend of George Herbert the poet², and was in all likelihood personally known to George's brother. But Herbert's silence is very intelligible. The two men were in their characters and in the results of their labours as the poles asunder. Unlike Herbert, Bacon measured accurately the trivialities of court life: he placed them for his own advantage, but he fully recognized their hollowness; he knew his own superiority to them and to those who found pleasure in them. But as philosophers Herbert and Bacon differ more materially than in the conduct of their lives. The latter sought to extend and systematize knowledge, to put into man's hand and brain the means of conquering nature by enabling him to interpret it, to enlist nature in the service of mankind. 'Man is but what he knoweth', and experiment is the only sure road to knowledge. All à priori reasoning is to be renounced; induction is the only method that commands success in the pursuit of knowledge. Elaborating his argument, Bacon surveyed the whole field of human knowledge, and showed how inductive methods advanced its limits and how deductive methods narrowed them. Herbert's scheme was not less ambitious, but did not cover the same ground. He was content to investigate the mental processes by which man could acquire any knowledge at all, and here he declared experiment to be of no avail. He therefore relied on deductive argument alone. Bacon has hinted that if he had attacked this subject he would have applied inductive methods to it as to all his other speculations. He had no sympathy with metaphysics, which he defined as a temporary substitute for physics; he asserted that when scientific induction had been sufficiently systematized, metaphysics would succumb at its approach, would (we may take it) form part of psychology, and be as amenable to practical experiment as any other branch of science. For the present he deemed it well to let the topic alone. Religious speculation was in much the same case. He tacitly assumed a vague relationship between religion and morality, but he avoided a discussion which could neither strengthen nor weaken the framework of his scientific system. He was content to describe religion as it was, and to treat it as based 'on the word and work of God and upon the light of nature'. Reason, he said, must not attempt to prove or examine the mysteries of faith—and these mysteries he identifies with the ordinarily accepted teaching of revelation. In religious debate Herbert was thus logically far in advance of Bacon, and they had few other topics in common. There is nothing, therefore, ungenerous in the failure of the younger writer to make any acknowledgment of the work of the older¹.

¹ See p. 143.

² Bacon dedicated his translation of the Psalms (1625) to George Herbert.

In their immediate effect on contemporary opinion, Herbert's philosophical writings were little better than abortive. Although widely read², their significance was not appreciated. While the purely speculative part proved unintelligible, the religious discussions excited nearly universal hostility, begetting libros non liberos. Of the treatise De Veritate, Sir William Dugdale writes in 1674: 'It much passeth my understanding, being wholly philosophical'³. Evelyn notes in his Diary that Herbert's brother, Sir Henry, presented him with a copy⁴, but gives no indication that he put himself to the pains of reading it. The only English writer of the time who attempted a serious discussion of Lord Herbert's philosophy was Nathaniel Culverwel, a fellow of Emanuel College, Cambridge, whose Discourse of the Light of Nature was first published in 1652. Culverwel is as powerful a writer in support of the doctrine of a priori knowledge as Lord Herbert himself, but he opposes the theory of innate ideas, and asserts, in contradiction to Lord

¹ They are most closely in agreement in their references to Telesius, who had anticipated some of Bacon's arguments in favour of experiment as the only sure road to knowledge. Herbert advises young men to study Telesius's writings, and clearly attaches high value to them. Bacon similarly applauds them in his treatise De Principiis, and owes more to them than he acknowledges. (See note on p. 27, infra.)

² The first edition of De Veritate (1624) was succeeded by a second in 1633, and a third in 1645.

³ Dugdale's Diary and Correspondence, p. 397.

⁴ Evelyn's Diary, ed. Bray and Wheatley, ii, 36.

Herbert, that the suggesting influence of sense and experience are necessary to the translation of our primary notions into consciousness. But when Culverwel proceeds to erect a theological superstructure upon his speculative theories in close conformity with orthodox Christianity, he will have no further truce with the author of De Veritate. Religion, according to Culverwel, 'is built upon a surer and higher rock—upon a more adamantine and precious foundation' than Herbert's 'common notions', and he finally identifies Herbert with those who have 'arrived to that full perfection of error . . . that have a powder-plot against the Gospel; that would very compendiously behead all Christian religion at one blow—a device which old and ordinary heretics were never acquainted withal' ¹. In this spirit Herbert was criticized by Thomas Halyburton, a professor of divinity at St. Andrews, who was especially scandalized by Herbert's identification of the principles of true religion with notions current in pagan writers.² Richard Baxter, in More Reason for the Christian Religion, and No Reason against it (1672), animadverted in a like temper on Lord Herbert's arguments, and insists that the Scriptures are the sole product of the Spirit's inspiration, and contain no word that is not infallibly true. 'Supernatural evidence' alone can produce a satisfactory apprehension of religion; and there is no supernatural evidence outside the Gospel of Christ. Charles Blount (1654–1693) is the only seventeenth century writer in England who proved himself a disciple of Lord Herbert, but he was no original thinker, but a confirmed plagiarist, and literally borrowed from his master without always acknowledging his obligations. He published a Religio Laici in 1682, which is a slavish reproduction of Lord Herbert's volume of the name, and this had been preceded in 1680 by Great is Diana of the Ephesians; or, the Original of Idolatry, together with the Politick Institution of the Gentiles' Sacrifices, a feeble reflection of Herbert's *De Religione Gentilium*¹. Not until Locke wrote did Herbert, as a philosopher, receive anything like justice from his own countrymen. Locke disagrees with him at every turn, but he honestly explains his position; and no better introduction to Herbert's system is at present accessible than the first book of Locke's Essay on the Human Understanding. Locke as an empiricist and sensationalist hunts to the death the theory of innate ideas, but he accepts Herbert's five 'common notions' of religion as truths of reason, and in his Reasonableness of Christianity he joins hands with Herbert in denouncing the irrational dogmas of priests, although he is content to deduce a definition of faith from an historical examination of Scripture. At a later date, Dr Leland (1691-1766) christened Herbert the father of English Deism; and while examining his doctrine from an unfriendly point of view, supplies another intelligible exposition of Herbert's religious writings².

¹ Culverwel's Light of Nature, p. 226, in the reprint published at Edinburgh in 1857. See also pp. 128–134, and pp. 211, 212. The preface to this edition, by John Cairns, M.A., is well worthy of study. Sir William Hamilton, in his edition of Reid's works (p. 782), justly calls attention to Culverwel's learning and intelligence. Robert Greville, Lord Brooke, remarkable for his enlightened and tolerant views, was author of a work of a similar kind—The Nature of Truth, 1641. But Lord Brooke confesses that he had not read Herbert's De Veritate very recently, and did not remember it (p. 40); he approaches his subject from a purely Christian point of view, while working out the Platonic theory, that all our ideas are remembrances of a former existence. Dr John Wallis, the mathematician, replied to Brooke in Truth Tried, 1643, in which he showed the inconsistency of identifying knowledge of matters of fact with implanted ideas.

² Natural Religion Insufficient (1714) is the title of Halyburton's work.

Abroad, at an earlier date than at home, Herbert found the recognition that was due to him, but there, too, he failed to make converts or disciples. In 1643 Herbert presented a copy of the De Veritate to Charles Diodati, Milton's friend, and Diodati forwarded it to Gassendi, eminent as the champion of Epicurean atomism, and the reviver of systematic materialism. In Gassendi's Works³ is an adequate discussion of Herbert's system. He agrees in the main with his theory of perception—intellectus cognoscentis cum re cognita congruentia; but complains—very politely, it is true—of Herbert's obscurity, objects that man's reason deals not with the real nature of things, but with such appearances of them as are known to him through the senses, and doubts the universality of Herbert's common notions. Descartes, the most eminent of Herbert's foreign contemporaries, also spoke of Herbert with respect, and made a thorough study of his works. But he likewise is not deeply impressed by their veracity. 'J'y trouve', he writes of them, 'plusieurs choses fort bonnes, sed non publici saporis; car il y a peu de personnes qui soient capables d'entendre la metaphysique. Et pour le général du livre il tient un chemin fort différent de celui que j'ai suivi. . . . Enfin par conclusion, encore que je ne puisse m'accorder en tout aux sentiments de cet auteur, je ne laisse pas de l'estimer beaucoup audessus des esprits ordinaires.' Neither as philosopher, mathematician, nor physieist did Descartes accept Herbert's guidance ¹.

¹ Blount claimed to have used some unpublished notes by Lord Herbert in his best-known work—'The Two First Books of Apollonius Tyaneus, written originally in Greek, with Philological Notes upon each chapter' (1680), but he apparently only drew upon Herbert's published books. See Sir Leslie Stephen's article on Blount in the Dictionary of National Biography.

² Dr John Leland's View of the Principal Deistical Writers, i, 1-34. Charles Blount is placed second on Leland's list of English Deists.

³ Opera, iii, 411.

Of the solid seriousness of Lord Herbert's student life ample proof has already been adduced, but it is only just to him to supplement the evidence with a few words on his poetry and his historical work. Little as we might expect it, he was free from the puniest of all forms of vanity which prompts the would-be poet to rush into print as soon as his verse is committed to paper. So far as Lord Herbert himself was concerned, the world at large might still be without the poems which came from his pen. They were printed for the first time by his brother Henry, seventeen years after their author had been laid in the grave. Yet from youth till he was at least fifty years old did Herbert solace his leisure with the production of English and Latin poetry. And with characteristic versatility he did not restrict his efforts to any one class of composition. Love and philosophy alternately inspire his muse; sonnets and epitaphs, ditties and satires occupy his attention by turns. As a poet, Herbert proves himself the ablest of all the disciples of Donne. Like his master, he revels in subtleties of thought and diction, and very often exhibits so crude a power of expression as to offend a sensitive reader's ear ². No versifier ever lumbered more awkwardly through ten pages of print than does Lord Herbert in his two satires ³. His fantastic echo-poems are too quaint to be pleasing, and far-fetched conceits repel us in the epitaphs on his friends. When at his best, we can never be certain that the current of his utterances will not be interrupted by some grotesque discord. Nevertheless Lord Herbert has every right to the title of poet. The author of the Ditty in Imitation of the Spanish possessed true lyrical inspiration.

¹ Other hostile attacks on Lord Herbert's position may be found in J. Musæus' Examen Cherburianismi sive de Luminis Naturæ insufficientia ad salutem contra E. Herbertum de Cherbury (1675 and 1708); C. Kortholt's De Tribus Impostoribus (i.e. Herbert, Hobbes, and Spinoza), 1680 and 1700; and J. Ogilvie's An Enquiry into the Infidelity of the Times, with Observations on Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1783).

² Ben Jonson told Drummond of Hawthornden in 1619 that 'Donne said to him he wrote that Epitaph on Prince Henry, Look to me, Faith (1613), to match Sir Ild. Herbert in obscureness' (Ben Jonson's Conversations with Drummond, p. 8). Herbert also wrote an epitaph on Prince Henry in 1613.

³ The first is entitled The State Progress of Ill; and the second, Satyræ Secunda of Travellers from Paris, is addressed to Ben Jonson. The former is dated August 1608, the latter September 1608. I give an extract from the second on p. 48, note.

Now that the April of your youth adorns
 The garden of your face,
 Now that for you each knowing lover mourns,
 And all seek to your grace,
 Do not repay affection with scorn.

What though you may a matchless beauty vaunt,
 And all that hearts can move
 By such a power that seemeth to enchant,
 Yet, without help of love,
 Beauty no pleasure to itself can grant.

Then think each minute that you lose a day.
 The longest Youth is short,
 The shortest Age is long; Time flies away,
 And makes us but his sport,
 And that which is not Youth's is Age's prey.

Verse like this recalls Herrick in his most graceful moods, and evinces far higher powers of reflection. In his purely contemplative poems, which chiefly deal with 'Platonick Love' Lord Herbert has reminded a very competent critic of Mr. Robert Browning's forms of thought and expression; and a quaint sonnet addressed to Black Itself is not without resemblance to Blanco White's famous sonnet on Night. But Lord Herbert is brought into closest affinity with modern poetry by the masterly command he displayed over the metre which Lord Tennyson has carried to perfection in his In Memoriam. He has anticipated the Laureate in many of the finest effects of which the latter has proved the metre capable, as the following examples prove:

You are the first were ever lov'd,
 And who may think this not so true,
 So little knows of love or you,
 It need not otherwise be prov'd.

Yet, as in our Northern clime
 Rare fruits, though late, appear at last;
 As we may see, some years being past,
 Our orange trees grow ripe with time;—

So think not strange, if Love to break
His wonted silence now makes bold :
For [when] a love is seven years old,
Is it not time to learn to speak ?¹

In his Latin verse Lord Herbert often expresses himself clumsily and inharmoniously, but taken as a whole his Latin poems form a substantial testimony to his scholarship and general culture.

Herbert's History of Henry VIII is his most ambitious essay in English prose. The work was undertaken, as I have shown below, with political objects, and unfortunately exhibits little of that independent criticism which gives value to Lord Herbert's philosophical writings. It is an unmeasured eulogy of Henry VIII's statesmanship, and a laboured endeavour to condone the crimes of his private life². Yet, in apparent contradiction of his aims, Herbert acknowledged the obligation which lies upon the historian to deduce his facts from original research. How far he personally engaged in the examination of the documents which are incorporated in the history has been matter of dispute. He employed many clerks to search the Paper Office at Whitehall, and one of these, Thomas Master, a Fellow of New College, Oxford, was popularly reputed to have had a large share in the construction of the published book³. But no

¹ These verses are from the Ditty, pp. 41-43, in J. Churton Collins' edition of the poems. But An Ode upon a question moved whether love should continue for ever, pp. 92-98, should also be examined, and would deserve quotation if space permitted it. Mr Churton Collins remarks on the affinity of Lord Tennyson's and Herbert's metre in the introduction to his edition, the whole of which is well worthy the perusal of the student of Lord Herbert's writings. Herbert seems to have suggested another poem of the Laureate in the lines beginning:

Tears, flow no more, or if you needs must flow,
Fall yet more slow.

² See pp. 142 et seq.

³ Wood, in his Athens Oxon, ed. Bliss, iii, says of Master: 'He was a drudge to, and assisted much, Edward, Lord Herbert of Cheshire, when he was obtaining materials for the writing of the Life of King Henry VIII. Four thick volumes in folio of such materials I have lying by me now, in every one of which I find his handwriting, either in interlining, adding, or correcting, and one of these four, which is entitled Collectaneorum lib. Secundum, is mostly written by him, collected from Parliament Rolls, the Paper Office at Whitehall, Vicar-General's Office, books belonging to the Clerks of the Council, MSS. in Cotton's Library, books of Convocations of the Clergy, etc., printed authors, etc. And there is no doubt that as he had an especial hand in composing the said Life of King Henry VIII (which, as some say, he turned mostly into Latin, but never printed), so had he a hand in latinising that Lord's book, De Veritate, or others'. An affectionate Latin epitaph on Master, who died in 1643, and some Latin hexameters, entitled Mensa Lusoria, or a Shovelboard-Table to Mr Master, appear among Herbert's poems. Aubrey states that Master lived with Herbert till 1642. The MS. volumes containing Herbert's materials for his history are now in Jesus College Library. The work was first published in 1649 by a London stationer named Whitaker. Whitaker had some litigation in the House of Lords with Lord Herbert's grandson Edward as to his right to print the book, each litigant affirming that Lord Herbert had given the MS. to him for his sole use.

solid argument has been produced to rob Herbert of the substantial credit of its authorship, or to prove that his assistants lent him more than mechanical service. He therefore deserves recognition as the producer of a standard historical authority, which is vitiated, but not rendered nugatory, by its frank acknowledgment of partisanship. The style of Lord Herbert's history is as unequal as that of the autobiography, and proves that whether as prose-writer or poet, he did not possess full command of the instrument of language. He depreciates his style very frequently in his private letters ¹, and although self-depreciation from his lips must not be assumed to be sincere, his remarks about his failings in this respect deserve to be taken literally. The construction of his sentences is often suspiciously involved. Where concentrated energy of utterance is necessary to give full effect to his meaning, he sometimes grows tediously loquacious. In his philosophical works he acknowledged conciseness and precision to be of prime importance, and wisely took refuge from himself, not perhaps with complete success, in the artificial restraints imposed by the Latin language. But although his English prose lack the niceties of a great style, his vocabulary is so simple and so copious that he can rarely be misunderstood. He is perspicuous even when he is ungrammatical. He is ever pretentious in his choice of words, and has no mannerisms. His diction is without the majesty of Milton or of Sir Thomas Browne; but it has the historical merit of reflecting the best characteristics of the everyday speech of its day ².

I have endeavoured to place before the reader a just estimate of Lord Herbert's character in all its contradictory aspects; to make manifest that the light-hearted vainglorious man of the world whose autobiography is printed below was, contrary to all the expectations which the work excites, a poet and a subtle-souled psychologist. Inconsistencies are apparent in all Lord Herbert's actions, and in all his speculations; and some such far-reaching theory, as the poet Browning was wont to weave round Janus-like personalities, is necessary to weld Lord Herbert's inconsistencies in one harmonious whole. It should be remembered, however, that Lord Herbert's complicated character does not stand alone in his own age, and that Bacon and Raleigh present as puzzling enigmas to the biographer. Probably in the spirit of the time a solution of such riddles may be discoverable. That spirit was a strange concoction, formed of simples that could not readily mingle. Ideas that sprang from modern and from ancient Italy, from classicism and mediævalism, from base and pure forms of Christianity, all sought at once, in the late sixteenth and the early seventeenth centuries, to gain the mastery over Englishmen's minds. In the seething strife high ideals were formed and translated into act, but low ideals were also generated, and demanded an equal share of recognition. Torn asunder by conflicting ambitions, men's conduct lacked internal unity. Greatness allied itself with littleness, virtue with vice. Romancers have figured men living two lives, men combining two distinct personalities in a single corporeal frame. Such freaks of nature are commonly believed to find their homes in dreamland ; but they are confined to no impalpable realm ; the divided aims of Herbert's, and of Bacon's, and of Raleigh's lives prove indubitably that the romancers do not always romance.

¹ Cf. pp. 141 and 185.

² Lord Herbert also apparently interested himself in mechanical inventions. He sent to Windebank in 1635 a series of inventions suggested to him by an anonymous Feuchman, which included improvements in warships, gun-carriages, and a proposal for the construction of a floating bathing-palace on the Thames, opposite Somerset House (Cal. State Papers, 1635, pp. 62, 63). In 1638 he showed much interest in Thomas Bushnell's survey of North Wales for the purpose of discovering the presence of silver ore (Cal. State Papers, 3rd Oct. 1638).

THE history of the publication of the Autobiography deserves attention. In his will Lord Herbert writes : ' And whereas I have begun a manifest of my action in these late troubles, but am prevented in the review thereof, I do hereby leave it to a person, whom I shall by word instruct, to finish the same, and to publish it to the world by my direction, and as having the expresse charge layd upon him by me for doing it '. But the friend's name, if ever spoken, has not reached us. It is not quite clear whether Lord Herbert's refers to his autobiography in his testamentary reference to the ' manifest of my action in these late troubles ' which he had begun, but had left unfinished. But the extant autobiography, which breaks off very abruptly, may well have been a preliminary chapter of the contemplated ' manifest '. Two copies of the MS. of the autobiography remained after his death in Lord Herbert's family, one, which is said to be the original draft, with his grandson Edward, and the other, which is said to have been a copy of the original, with his brother Sir Henry. According to Oldys, the Lady Dowager Herbert, widow of Henry, the fourth lord of Cherbury, had lent the first copy to the Earl of Clarendon, on June 11, 1696 (Oldys' Diary, p. 25). Clarendon returned it, but it was found many years later in an illegible state at Lady Herbert's house, Lymore, Montgomeryshire, and was apparently destroyed. The second copy was sold with Sir Henry's estate at Ribbisford, but the new owner restored it to the Earl of Powis about 1738. Under date, 29th December 1763, Walpole refers to this second copy in his correspondence, and it was this MS. which he published. He was printing the MS. at his own press at Strawberry Hill during the winter of 1763-4, and promised Mason an impression ' of the most curious and entertaining book in the world . . . the Life of the famous Lord Herbert of Cherbury ' (Walpole's Letters, ed. Cunningham, iv, 156). On 16th July 1764, Walpole writes to George Montagu that the Life is ' the most curious book that ever set its foot into the world ', and gives the history of the undertaking. ' I found it a year ago at Lady Hertford's, to whom Lady Powis had lent it. I took it up and soon threw it down again, as the dullest thing I ever saw. She persuaded me to take it home. My Lady Waldegrave was here in all her grief : Gray and I read it to amuse her. We could not get on for laughing and screaming. I begged to have it in print. Lord Powis, sensible of the extravagance, refused. I insisted—he persisted. I told my Lady Hertford it was no matter, I would print it, I was determined. I sat down and wrote a flattering dedication to Lord Powis, which I knew he would swallow : he did, and gave up his ancestor ' (ibid. 252). On 16th December Walpole writes, that ' the thing most in fashion is my edition of Lord Herbert's Life ; people are mad after it ; I believe, because only two hundred were printed ' (ibid. 302). It is reasonable to suppose that the MS. was returned to Lord Powis, but the present Earl, a descendant, through the female line, of Walpole's friend, has informed me that he is ignorant of its present whereabouts. Walpole's edition was reprinted in 1770, 1809, and in 1826.

THE LIFE
OF
EDWARD, LORD HERBERT
OF CHERBURY

I do believe that, if all my ancestors had set down their lives in writing and left them to posterity, many documents necessary to be known of those who, both participate of¹ their natural inclinations and humours, must in all probability run a not much different course, might have been given for their instruction; and certainly it will be found much better for men to guide themselves by such observations as their father, grandfather, and great-grandfather might have delivered to them, than by those vulgar rules and examples, which cannot in all points so exactly agree unto them. Therefore, whether their life were private and contained only precepts necessary to treat with their children, servants, tenants, kinsmen, and neighbours, or employed abroad in the university, or study of the law, or in the court, or in the camp, their heirs might have benefited themselves more by them than by any else; for which reason I have thought fit to relate to my posterity those passages of my life, which I conceive may best declare me, and be most useful to them. In the delivery of which, I profess to write with all truth and sincerity, as scorning ever to deceive or speak false to any; and therefore detesting it much more where I am under obligation of speaking to those so near me: and if this be one reason for taking my pen in hand at this time, so as my age is now past threescore², it will be fit to recollect my former actions, and examine what had been done well or ill, to the intent I may both reform that which was amiss, and so make my peace with God, as also comfort myself in those things which, through God's great grace and favour, have been done according to the rules of conscience, virtue, and honour. Before yet I bring myself to this account, it will be necessary I say somewhat concerning my ancestors, as far as the notice of them is come to me in any credible way¹; of whom yet I cannot say much, since I was but eight years old when my grandfather died, and that my father lived but about four years after; and that for the rest I have lived for the most part from home, it is impossible I should have that entire knowledge of their actions which might inform me sufficiently; I shall only, therefore, relate the more known and undoubted parts of their lives.

¹ i.e. sharing.

² Lord Herbert was probably writing in 1643.

My father was Richard Herbert, Esq., son to Edward Herbert, Esq., and grandchild to Sir Richard Herbert, Knight, who was a younger son of Sir Richard Herbert of Colebrook, in Monmouthshire, of all whom I shall say a little. And first of my father, whom I remember to have been black-haired and bearded, as all my ancestors of his side are said to have been, of a manly or somewhat stern look, but withal very handsome and well compact in his limbs, and of a great courage, whereof he gave proof, when he was so barbarously assaulted by many men in the churchyard at Llanerfyl², at what time he would have apprehended a man who denied to appear to justice; for, defending himself against them all, by the help only of one John ap Howell Corbet, he chased his adversaries, until a villain, coming behind him, did, over the shoulders of others, wound him on the head behind with a forest-bill until he fell down; though recovering himself again, notwithstanding his skull was cut through to the pia mater of the brain, he saw his adversaries fly away, and after walked home to his house at Llyssyn³, where, after he was cured, he offered a single combat to the chief of the family, by whose procurement it was thought the mischief was committed; but he [i.e. the chief] disclaiming wholly the action as not done by his consent, which he offered to testify by oath, and the villain himself flying into Ireland, whence he never returned, my father desisted from prosecuting the business any farther in that kind, and attained, notwithstanding the said hurt, that health and strength, that he returned to his former exercises in a country life, and became the father of many children. As for his integrity in his places of deputy lieutenant of the county, justice of the peace, and *custos rotulorum*¹, which he, as my grandfather before him, held, it is so memorable to this day, that it was said his enemies appealed to him for justice, which they also found on all occasions. His learning was not vulgar, as understanding well the Latin tongue, and being well versed in history. My grandfather was of a various life; beginning first at court, where, after he had spent most part of his means, he became a soldier, and made his fortune with his sword at the siege of St. Quentin in France², and other wars, both in the north, and in the rebellions happening in the times of King Edward the Sixth, and Queen Mary, with so good success, that he not only came off still with the better, but got so much money and wealth, as enabled him to buy the greatest part of that livelihood which is descended to me; although yet I hold some lands which his mother, the Lady Anne Herbert³, purchased, as appears by the deeds made to her by that name, which I can show: and might have held more, which my grandfather sold under foot at an under value in his youth, and might have been recovered by my father, had my grandfather suffered him. My grandfather was noted to be a great enemy to the outlaws and thieves of his time, who robbed in great numbers in the mountains of Montgomeryshire, for the suppressing of whom he went often, both day and night, to the places where they were ; concerning which, though many particulars have been told me, I shall mention one only.¹ Some outlaws being lodged in an alehouse upon the hills of Llandinam, my grandfather and a few servants coming to apprehend them, the principal outlaw shot an arrow against my grandfather, which stuck in the pommel of his saddle ; whereupon my grandfather coming up to him with his sword in his hand, and taking him prisoner, he showed him the said arrow, bidding him look what he had done ; whereof the outlaw was no farther sensible, than to say, he was sorry that he left his better bow at home, which he conceived would have carried his shot to his body ; but the outlaw, being brought to justice, suffered for it. My grandfather's power was so great in the country, that divers ancestors of the better families now in Montgomeryshire were his servants, and raised by him². He delighted also much in hospitality ; as having a very long table twice covered every meal with the best meats that could be gotten, and a very great family. It was an ordinary saying in the country at that time, when they saw any fowl rise, ' Fly where thou wilt, thou wilt light at Blackhall ' ; which was a low building, but of great capacity, my grandfather erected in his age ;³ his father and himself, in former times, having lived in Montgomery Castle. Notwithstanding yet these expenses at home, he brought up his children well, married his daughters to the better sort of persons near him,⁴ and bringing up his younger sons at the university ; from whence his son Matthew⁵ went to the Low Country wars ; and, after some time spent

¹ Lord Herbert apparently possessed a number of family papers. Dugdale, in his account of the family (Baronage, ii, 256), quotes several particulars about William Herbert, the first Earl of Pembroke, from 'a certain manuscript book in the custody of Edward, now Lord Herbert of Cherbury', and he notes in the margin (ibid., ii, 258), when speaking of Sir Richard Herbert, Lord Herbert's great-grandfather 'excod. MS. penes Edward D. Herbert de Clurbury'. I have collected a few additional facts about Lord Herbert's ancestry in Appendix I. Izaak Walton says generally of the Herberts — 'A family that hath been blessed with men of remarkable wisdom and a willingness to serve their country, and indeed to do good to all mankind, for which they are eminent' (Life of G. Herbert).

² In the hundred of Caereimion, Montgomeryshire.

³ There is still a large farm of this name in the parish of Llanerfyl. It doubtless occupies the site of Richard Herbert's house (see p. 14, note 8).

¹ He was Sheriff of Montgomeryshire in 1576 and 1582, and is probably the Richard Herbert who sat as M.P. for Montgomeryshire in the Parliament of 1585-6. He died in 1596, and was buried in Montgomery Church on 15th October of that year (see p. 5, note 7).

² Edward Herbert, as captain-general over 500 men, under his kin-man, William Herbert (created Earl of Pembroke, 11th October 1551), joined the Spaniards in the storming and sacking of St. Quentin two days after it had been taken (16th August 1557) from the French. The latter were commanded by Anne, Duc de Montmorency, Constable of France, whose son and grandson are often mentioned by Lord Herbert below.

³ Anne, daughter of Sir David ap Evan (or Emion) ap Llewellyn Vaughan, Knt., and wife of Sir Richard Herbert of Montgomery (see p. 5).

¹ A few notes on the general condition of Wales in Lord Herbert's youth are collected in Appendix II.

² He was appointed deputy-constable of Aberystwith Castle (16th March 1543-4), by his cousin Sir William Herbert (see extract from Lord Powis' MSS. in Powysland Collections, xi, 361) ; was Sheriff of Montgomeryshire in 1537 and 1568 ; was M.P. for the county in 1553 and 1556-7 ; was knighted in 1571 (Metcalf's Knights, p. 128), His local influence is illustrated by a correspondence with Leicester in November 1580 as to the appointment of a sheriff of the county. He successfully insisted on the choice of Griffith Lloyd and the rejection of John Vaughan (Cal. State Papers, 1577-80, p. 686). He was at one time esquire of the body to Queen Elizabeth.

³ This house, also called Lymore, was standing in the middle of the seventeenth century. Lord Herbert retired to it during the troubles of the civil wars.

⁴ He had seven daughters. Mary, the eldest, married Thomas Purcell of Nantcribb, who was Sheriff of Montgomeryshire in 1597 ; Ann, the third daughter, married Charles Lloyd of Leighton, Sheriff in 1601 ; and Jane, the fourth daughter, married Jenkin Lloyd, Sheriff in 1588. (See Powysland Club Collections, ii, 387.)

⁵ Admitted a student of the Inner Temple, November 1582 (Admission Register, 1571-1625, p. 41). He married Ann, daughter of Charles Fox of Bromfield, and from him was descended in the fourth generation Henry Arthur Herbert, created Earl of Powis in 1748 (second creation).

there, came home, and lived in the country at Dolguog, upon a house and fair living, which my grandfather bestowed upon him. His son also, Charles Herbert¹, after he had passed some time in the Low Countries, likewise returned home, and was after married to an inheretrix², whose eldest son, called Sir Edward Herbert, Knight, is the king's attorney-general³. His son, George, who was of New College, in Oxford⁴, was very learned, and of a pious life, died in a middle age of a dropsy. Notwithstanding all which occasions of expense, my grandfather purchased much lands⁵, without doing anything yet unjustly or hardly, as may be collected by an offer I have publicly made divers times, having given my bailiff in charge to proclaim to the country, that if any lands were gotten by evil means, or so much as hardly, they should be compounded for or restored again; but to this day, never any man yet complained to me in this kind. He died at the age of fourscore, or thereabouts, and was buried in Montgomery Church⁶, without having any monument made for him, which yet for my father is there set up in a fair manner⁷.

My great-grandfather, Sir Richard Herbert, was steward, in the time of King Henry the Eighth, of the lordships and marches of North Wales, East Wales, and Cardiganshire, and had power, in a martial law, to execute offenders; in the using thereof he was so just, that he acquired to himself a singular reputation; as may appear upon the records of that time, kept in the Paper-Chamber at Whitehall, some touch whereof

¹ He is probably the 'Charles Herbert e co. Montgom.' who matriculated at Magdalen College, Oxford, 11th May 1582, at the age of fifteen. He lived at Aston, and was Sheriff of Montgomeryshire in 1608.

² Jane, sole heiress of Hugh ap Owen (Dwnn's Visitations, i, 312).

³ Of the Inner Temple. Appointed the Queen's Attorney-General, 1635; Solicitor-General, 1640; Attorney-General, 29th January 1640-1; impeached by the Commons, 8th March 1641-2; Charles II's Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, 1653; died at Paris 1657.

⁴ The name of George Herbert does not appear on the books of New College, Oxford, and I believe this statement to be an error. Together with the Charles Herbert mentioned above, a George Herbert matriculated at Magdalen College, 11th May 1582, at the age of sixteen.

⁵ In 1553, Sir William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, granted him the hundred of Cherbury and probably the castle of Montgomery. On 15th May 1570, he received a royal grant of the castle of Lyons, or Holt Castle, with several Shropshire manors.

⁶ 20th May 1593, according to the parish register. His wife, Elizabeth, daughter of Matthew Price of Newtown, Montgomeryshire, was buried in the same place on 26th May 1588.

⁷ This monument, in the Lymore Chancel of the church, was erected by Lord Herbert's mother in 1600. It is a large alabaster canopied tomb with recumbent figures of Richard Herbert (in complete armour) and of his wife, while small images of their seven sons and three daughters stand beside them. Drawings of the tomb, which is still well preserved, appear in the Powysland Collections, vi, 409; and in Dr Grosart's edition of George Herbert's Works (vol. ii, frontispiece).

I have made in my History of Henry the Eighth: of him I can say little more, than that he likewise was a great suppressor of rebels, thieves, and outlaws, and that he was just and conscionable; for if a false or cruel person had that power committed to his hands, he would have raised a great fortune out of it, whereof he left little, save what his father gave him, unto posterity. He lieth buried likewise in Montgomery: the upper monument of the two placed in the chancel being erected for him².

My great [great] grandfather, Sir Richard Herbert of Colebrook, was that incomparable hero, who (in the history of Hall and Grafton, as it appears³) twice passed through a great army of northern men alone, with his pole-axe in his hand, and returned without any mortal hurt, which is more than is famed of Amadis de Gaul, or the Knight of the Sun⁴. I shall, besides this relation of Sir Richard Herbert's prowess in the battle at Banbury, or Edgecot Hill⁵, being the place where the late battle was fought⁶, deliver some traditions concerning him, which I have received from good hands; one is, that the said Sir Richard Herbert being employed, together with his brother William, Earl of Pembroke⁷, to reduce certain rebels in North Wales, Sir Richard Herbert besieged a principal person of them at Harlech Castle in Merionethshire⁸; the captain of this place had been a soldier in the wars of France;

¹ Under date 1520, Lord Herbert says in his History: — 'In the greater part [of Wales] and particularly those [parts] in the East, West, and North Wales being about this time administered by my great grandfather, Sir Richard Herbert . . . such justice was used as I find him in our records highly commended to the King's Council by Rowland Lee, now President of Wales'.

² One of two tombs of different dates with recumbent armoured figures on them in Montgomery Church (on the east side of the monument to Lord Herbert's father) is locally believed to be the tomb of Sir Richard Herbert. Sir Richard was alive in 1535, though in ill-health, but the tomb does not appear to be of a date later than Henry VII's reign.

³ 1469. 'Sir Richard Herbert so valiantly acquitted himself that with his Pole-axe in his hand (as his enemies did afterward reporte) he twice by fine force passed through the battail of his adversaries and without any mortall woound returned'. Hall's Union of the Two Noble Families (1548), fol. ccij. b; cf. Grafton's Chronicle (1569), p. 676. This exploit was part of the action described at length below.

⁴ A proverbial reference; cf. Overbury's Characters (1616): 'It is neither Amadis de Gaul nor the Knight of the Sunne that is able to resist them'. Shadwell uses the phrase in his Virtuoso (1676).

⁵ See p. 8, note 1.

⁶ The battle of Edgehill (midway between Kineton, Warwickshire, and Banbury), fought on Sunday, 23d October 1642.

⁷ Of Raglan, Monmouthshire, 'a strict adherer to the House of York in divers bloody encounters with the Lancastrians'; created a baron by Edward IV 3d February 1461-2, and Earl of Pembroke 27th May 1468. Dugdale, in his Baronage (ii, 255) gives an extraordinary long list of Welsh castles and offices conferred on him in the early years of Edward IV's reign.

⁸ Harlech in 1468 was held by David ap Jevan ap Einion in behalf of the Lancastrian, whereupon he said, he had kept a castle in France so long, that he made the old women in Wales talk of him ; and that he would keep the castle so long, that he would make the old women in France talk of him : and indeed, as the place was almost impregnable but by famine, Sir Richard Herbert was constrained to take him in by composition : he surrendering himself upon condition that Sir Richard Herbert should do what he could to save his life : which being accepted, Sir Richard brought him to King Edward IV, desiring his Highness to give him a pardon, since he yielded up a place of importance, which he might have kept longer upon this hope. But the king replying to Sir Richard Herbert, that he had no power by his commission to pardon any, and therefore might, after the representation hereof to his Majesty, safe deliver him up to justice ; Sir Richard Herbert answered, he had not yet done the best he could for him ; and therefore most humbly desired his Highness to do one of two things—either to put him again in the castle where he was, and command some other to take him out ; or, if his Highness would not do so, to take his life for the said captain's, that being the last proof he could give that he used his uttermost endeavour to save the said captain's life. The king finding himself urged thus far, gave Sir Richard Herbert the life of the said captain, but withal he bestowed no other reward for his service. The other history is, that Sir Richard Herbert, together with his brother the Earl of Pembroke, being in Anglesea, apprehending there seven brothers, which had done many mischiefs and murders ; in these times the Earl of Pembroke thinking it fit to root out so wicked a progeny, commanded them all to be hanged ; whereupon the mother of them coming to the Earl of Pembroke, upon her knees desired him to pardon two, or at leastwise one of her said sons, affirming, that the rest were sufficient to satisfy justice or example, which request also Sir Richard Herbert seconded ; but the earl finding them all equally

Jasper Earl of Pembroke. The Herberts ravaged all the neighbourhood in the service of Edward IV, seized the castle, and granted a safe-conduct to the defenders, if they would parley with them. See Wynne's Gwydir Family (1878), p. 249. Thomas Churchyard describes the exploit in his Worthines of Wales, 1587. Edward IV is speaking :

Our castle then of Hardelech that from our first daies raigne
A refuge for all Rebels did against us still remaine :
A fort of wondrous force besiege about did he,
And tooke it, where in most men's mynds, it could not taken be.
He won it, and did make them yeeld, who then their safetie sought :
And all the countrie thereabout to our obedience brought.

guilty, said, he could make no distinction betwixt them, and therefore commanded them to be executed together; at which the mother was so aggrieved, that, with a pair of woollen beads on her arms (for so the relation goeth), she, on her knees, cursed him, praying God's mischief might fall to him in the first battle he should make. The earl after this, coming with his brother to Edgecote Field¹, as is before set down, after he had put his men in order to fight, found his brother, Sir Richard Herbert, in the head of his men, leaning upon his pole-axe in a kind of sad or pensive manner; whereupon the earl said, 'What! doth thy great body (for he was higher by the head than any one in the army) apprehend anything that thou art so melancholy, or art thou weary with marching, that thou doest lean thus upon thy pole-axe?' Sir Richard Herbert replied, that he was neither of both, whereof he should see the proof presently; 'only I cannot but apprehend on your part, lest the curse of the woman with the woollen beads fall upon you'. This Sir Richard Herbert lieth buried in Abergavenny, in a sumptuous monument for those times, which still remains²; whereas his brother, the Earl of Pem-

¹ In 1469 some northern men led by Robert Hilyard, otherwise Robin of Redesdale, marched south to attack the Yorkist government with the object of restoring Henry VI. They were aided by Sir John Coniers and Lords Latimer and FitzHugh, relatives of the Earl of Warwick (who was on the point of deserting from Edward IV). The Herberts, and Humphrey, Lord Stafford (created Earl of Devonshire), were ordered to intercept the rebels. The two Yorkist forces met at Banbury, where Stafford quarrelled with the elder Herbert and led his men away. On 26th July the rebels attacked the Herberts with their six or seven thousand Welsh followers, and gained a decisive victory at Edgecote Field near the town. Both brothers were taken prisoner and beheaded at Northampton, 28th July. Hall states that the Earl of Warwick, who, doubtless, was mainly responsible for the fate of the Herberts, had had a private quarrel with the elder brother respecting the wardship of Lord Bonville's daughter. (See Hall's Chronicle and Warkworth's Chronicle (Camden Soc.), pp. 7, 8, 44, 45).

² His wife, Margaret, was buried by his side. A description of the tomb, now in ruins, is given in Coxe's Tour in Monmouthshire (1801), p. 187; cf. Churchyard's Worthines of Wales (1587), p. 53:

In tombe as trim as that before
Sir Richard Harbert lyes *:
He was at Banbrie field of yore
And through the battaile twice;
He past with Pollax in his hands,
A manly act in dedde
To preace among so many hauds
As yon of him may rede.
This valiant knight at Colbroke dwelt Nere Aborgaynie towne:
Who when his fatall destinie felt
And fortune slong him downe,
Among his enemies lost his head,
A ruefull tale to tell:

Here buried was as I haue said
In sumptuous Tombe full well †.
His wife Dame Margaret by his side ‡
Lyes there likewise for troth:
Their armes as yet may be tryed
(In honor of them both)
Stands at their heads, three Lyons white
He gines as well as he might:
Three Ranens blacke in shilde she gines
As daughter to a knight.
A sheafe of Arrows vnder head
He hath as due to him.
Thus there this worthis couple lye
In tombe full fine and trim.

* Churchyard's marginal notes are as follows: 'Sir Richard Harbert of Colbroke, Knight'.

† 'On the left hand of the chappell they lye'.

‡ 'She was daughter to Thomas ap Griffith, father to Sir Rice ap Thomas, Knight broke, being buried in Tintern Abbey, his monument, together with the church, lie now wholly defaced and ruined ¹. This Earl of Pembroke had a younger son, which had a daughter which married the eldest son of the Earl of Worcester ², who carried away the fair castle of Raglan, with many thousand pounds yearly, from the heir-male of that house, which was the second son ³ of the said Earl of Pembroke, and ancestor of the family of St Julians [Monmouthshire], whose daughter and heir I after married, as shall be told in its place ⁴. And here it is very remarkable, that the younger sons of the said Earl of Pembroke, and Sir R. Herbert, left their posterity after them, who, in the person of myself and my wife, united both houses again ⁵; which is the more memorable, that when the said Earl of Pembroke and Sir R. Herbert were taken prisoners in defending the just cause of Edward IV at the battle above-said, the earl never entreated that his own life might be saved, but his brother's, as it appears by the said history ⁶. So that joining of both houses together in my posterity, ought to produce a perpetual obligation of friendship and mutual love in them one to another, since by these two brothers, so brave an example thereof was given, as seeming not to live or die but for one another.

My mother was Magdalen Newport, daughter of Sir Richard Newport ⁷ and Margaret his wife, daughter and heir of Sir Thomas Bromley, one of the privy council, and excensor of King Henry the Eighth ⁸, who, surviving her husband, ¹ According to the Earl's will (27th July 1469), printed in Dugdale (ii, 257), he bequeathed much property to Tintern Abbey, but desired to be buried at Abergaveunyn—a direction which was not observed.

² This is a loose statement. The reference is to Elizabeth, daughter of William Herbert (created Earl of Huntingdon 1479), son and heir, and not younger son, of the Earl of Pembroke. She married, about 1490, Charles Somerset, illegitimate son of Henry, Duke of Somerset. Charles became Earl of Worcester, and Lord Herbert of Gower and Chelston (1514), and held high office under Henry VIII. He died in 1525. (See Lord Herbert's Henry VIII and Dugdale's Baronage, ii, 258, 292-4.)

³ The reference is to Sir George Herbert of St Julians, the third son; he married Jane, daughter of Sir Richard Crofts.

⁴ See p. 21.

⁵ See the Genealogical Table.

⁶ Hall reports the dying speech: 'Masters, let me dye, for I am olde, but save my brother which is yonge, lusty, and hardye, mete and apt to serve the greatest prince of Christendom' (i. cclij).

⁷ Knighted 1566; buried at Wroxeter, 12th September 1570. His epitaph, and that of his wife, who was buried with him, are printed in Dr Grosart's edition of George Herbert's Works, i, 27.

⁸ Bromley was made a judge of the King's Bench in 1544; was a member of Edward VI's council of regency; was made the Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas by Mary I in 1553; died in 1555, and was buried in Wroxeter. He bought Eytton, Lord Herbert's birthplace, of the crown in 1547, and received a legacy of £300 under Henry VIII's will.

gave rare testimonies of an incomparable piety to God, and love to her children, as being most assiduous and devout in her daily both private and public prayers, and so careful to provide for her posterity, that though it were in her power to give her estate (which was very great) to whom she would, yet she continued still unmarried, and so provident for them, that, after she had bestowed all her daughters, with sufficient portions, upon very good neighbouring families, she delivered up her estate and care of housekeeping to her eldest son Francis ¹, when now she had for many years kept hospitality with that plenty and order as exceeded all either of her country or time; for, besides abundance of provision and good cheer for guests, which her son Sir Francis Newport continued, she used ever after dinner to distribute with her own hands to the poor, who resorted to her in great numbers, alms in money, to every one of them more or less, as she thought they needed it. By these ancestors I am descended of Talbot, Devereux, Grey, Corbet, and many other noble families, as may be seen in their matches, extant in the many fair coats the Newports bear. I could say much more of my ancestors of that side likewise, but that I should exceed my proposed scope: I shall, therefore, only say somewhat more of my mother, my brothers, and sisters. And for my mother, after she lived most virtuously and lovingly with her husband for many years, she, after his death, erected a fair monument for him in Montgomery Church ²; brought up her children carefully, and put them in good courses for making their fortunes, and, briefly, was that woman Dr. Donne hath described in his funeral sermon of her printed ³. The names of her children were—Edward, Richard, William, Charles, George, Henry, Thomas; her daughters were, Elizabeth, Margaret, Frances; of all whom I will say a little before I begin a narration of my own life, so I may pursue my intended purpose the more entirely.

¹ Knighted in 1603; married Beatrice, daughter of Rowland Lacon of Kinlet. His son Richard became first Lord Newport (1642), and his grandson Francis first Earl of Bradford (1694). Both were prominent royalists.

² See p. 5, note 7.

³ She re-married in 1608, her second husband being Sir John Danvers, third son of Sir John Danvers of Dauntsey, Wilts, and twenty years Lady Herbert's junior. She was buried in Chelsea Church, 8th June 1627. Dr. Donne's funeral sermon bears the title: A Sermon of Commemoration of the Lady Danvers, late Wife of Sir John Danvers. Preach'd at Chelsey, where she was lately buried, by Iohn Donne, D. of St. Paul's London, 1. July 1627. Together with other Commemorations of her, by her sonne, George Herbert. London, 1627, 12mo. Extracts from this volume, and from Walton's account of her in his Life of George Herbert, are given in Appendix III.

My brother Richard, after he had been brought up in learning, went to the Low Countries, where he continued many years with much reputation, both in the wars and for fighting single duels, which were many; insomuch, that between both, he carried, as I have been told, the scars of four-and-twenty wounds upon him to his grave, and lieth buried in Bergen-op-zoom ¹. My brother William, being brought up likewise in learning, went afterwards to the wars in Denmark, where, fighting a single combat, and having his sword broken, he not only defended himself with that piece which remained, but, closing with his adversary, threw him down, and so held him until company came in; and then went to the wars in the Low Countries, but lived not long after ². My brother Charles ³ was fellow of New College in Oxford, where he died young, after he had given great hopes of himself every way. My brother George ⁴ was so excellent a scholar, that he was made the public orator of the University in Cambridge; some of whose English works are extant; which, though they be rare in their kind, yet are far short of expressing those perfections he had in the Greek and Latin tongue, and all divine and human literature: his life was most holy and exemplary; insomuch, that about Salisbury, where he lived, beneficed for many years, he was little less than sainted. He was not exempt from passion and choler, being infirmities to which all our race is subject, but that excepted, without reproach

¹ He probably served with his brothers, Edward and Thomas, at Juliers, 1610; joined the English contingent in Germany under Sir Horace Vere in 1618, and was with Count Mansfeldt at the relief of Bergen-op-Zoom in 1622, where he doubtless met his death.

² In 1617 William Herbert raised a troop of horse in Holland for the Duke of Savoy (see p. 95).

³ Born in 1592, Charles Herbert was admitted to Winchester School in 1603, became a scholar of New College, Oxford, 4th June 1611, and fellow, 3d June 1613, and died in 1617. For these dates I am indebted to the Warden of New College, the Rev. Dr Sewell. Verses by Charles Herbert appear in Dr Zouch's The Dove, and the lines signed 'C. H.' in the Travels of Sir Thomas Herbert (1634) have been attributed to him, but the dates make this identification doubtful.

⁴ Born at Montgomery Castle, 3d April 1593; educated at Westminster School; proceeded to Trinity College, Cambridge, in 1608; B.A., 1611; M.A., 1615; elected fellow of his College; public orator of the University, 1619-27; spent some time at court; ordained after 1625; chaplain to his kinsman, Philip, Earl of Pembroke; rector of Fugglestone and Bemerton, near Salisbury, from 1630; buried at Bemerton, 3d March 1632-3. Two volumes of poems were issued after his death: The Temple, in 1633, and The Synagogue, in 1640. Poems to his mother's memory were published with Donne's sermon in 1627.

in his actions. Henry ¹, after he had been brought up in learning, as the other brothers were, was sent by his friends into France, where he attained the language of that country in much perfection; after which time he came to court, and was made gentleman of the king's privy chamber, and master of the revels; by which means, as also by a good marriage, he attained to great fortunes, for himself and posterity to enjoy. He also hath given several proofs of his courage in duels, and otherwise; being no less dexterous in the ways of the court, as having gotten much by it. My brother Thomas was a posthumous, as being born some weeks after his father's death.² He also, being brought up a while at school, was sent as a page to Sir Edward Cecil³, lord-general of his Majesty's auxiliary forces to the princes in Germany, and was particularly at the siege of Juliers⁴, A.D. 1610, where he showed such forwardness, as no man in that great army before him was more adventurous on all occasions. Being returned from thence, he went to the East Indies, under the command of Captain Joseph, who, in his way thither, meeting with a great Spanish ship, was unfortunately killed in fight with them⁵; whereupon, his men being disheartened, my brother Thomas encouraged them to revenge the loss, and renewed the fight in that manner (as Sir John Smyth, governor of the East India Company⁶, told me at several times), that they forced the Spanish ship to run aground, ¹ Born 1595 at Montgomery; became Master of the Revels about 1621; was knighted by James I, 7th August 1623; was very intimate with Charles I, and was a consistent royalist throughout the civil wars. He was twice married, his second wife being Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Robert Offley of Lincolnshire. At the Restoration he again became Master of the Revels, and died in 1673. He was a frequent correspondent of his brothers, Edward and George. His invaluable MS. Diary of plays licensed by him between 1621 and 1641, is in the possession of the Earl of Powis, and has never been fully printed. He edited Lord Herbert's poems in 1665.

² The Register of Montgomery Church gives the date 25th May 1597. The father died in the previous October.

³ Third son of the famous Lord Burgley's elder son Thomas, first Earl of Essex. After serving in the Low Countries for nearly thirty-five years, he was created Baron Cecil of Putney (1625), and Viscount Wimbledon (1626). He died 16th November 1638.

⁴ Lord Herbert gives an account of this campaign, p. 60 et seq.

⁵ In December 1610, Captain Benjamin Joseph sailed in the Globe as commander of the East India Company's fleet. Early in the following March the fleet was attacked by a Portuguese carrack, and Captain Joseph, 'a man of extraordinary note and respect', was killed. (See Sainsbury's Calendar of Colonial Papers.)

⁶ Sir Thomas Smyth, the first Governor of the Company, was appointed in 1600, and was re-elected to the post for every year between 1607 and 1621. He died towards the end of 1625. Mr. W. N. Sainsbury of the Record Office informs me that Sir John, Sir Thomas Smyth's son, admitted to the freedom of the Company by patrimony, 30th June 1619, was never Governor. (See Calendar of Colonial Papers.)

where the English shot her through and through so often that she run herself aground, and was left wholly unserviceable. After which time, he, with the rest of the fleet, came to Surat, and from thence, went with the merchants to the Great Mogul; where, after he had stayed about a twelvemonth, he returned with the same fleet back again to England¹. After this, he went in the navy which King James sent to Algiers, under the command of Sir Robert Mansel, where our men being in great want of money and victuals, and many ships scattering themselves to try whether they could obtain a prize, whereby to relieve the whole fleet²; it was his hap to meet with a ship, which he took, and in it, to the value of eighteen hundred pounds, which, it was thought, saved the whole fleet from perishing. He conducted, also, Count Mansfeld to the Low Countries³, in one of the king's ships, which, being unfortunately cast away not far from the shore, the count, together with his company, saved themselves in a long-boat, or shallop, the benefit whereof my said brother refused to take for the present, as resolving to assist the master of the ship, who endeavoured by all means to clear the ship from the danger; but finding it impossible, he was the last man that saved himself in the long-boat; the master thereof yet refusing to come away, so that he perished together with the ship. After this, he commanded one of the ships that were sent to bring the prince from Spain; where, upon his return, there being a fight between the Low Country-men and the Dunkirkers, the prince, who thought it was not for his dignity to suffer them to fight in his presence, commanded some of his ships to part them; whereupon my said brother, with some other ships, got betwixt them on either side, and shot so long, that both parties were glad to desist. After he had brought the prince safely home, he was appointed to go with one of the king's ships to the Narrow Seas¹. He also fought divers times with great courage and success, with divers men in single fight, sometimes hurting and disarming his adversary, and sometimes driving him away. After all these proofs given of himself, he expected some great command; but finding himself, as he thought, undervalued, he retired to a private and melancholy life, being much discontented to find others preferred to him; in which sullen humour having lived many years, he died and was buried in London, in St Martin's near Charing Cross²; so that of all my brothers none survives but Henry.

¹ Sir Thomas Roe, the first accredited envoy to the Great Mogul, notes, in a despatch dated Mandow, 3d November 1617, that 'Mr. Herbert, weary of the progress (i.e., with the English merchants to the Great Mogul's court) is bound for England'. He apparently returned to Surat at the end of 1617, and sailed in the Globe, the ship in which he came, very early in the following year. (See Cal. of Colonial Papers, 1617-18.) Care must be taken to distinguish this Thomas Herbert from his kinsman of the same name, who was at Surat ten years later, and then paid a visit to the Great Mogul, a full account of which is given in his published Travels (1634).

² Sir Robert Mansel arrived with twenty ships in the roads of Algiers, 27th November 1620, to punish the Dey for his piratical attacks on English ships in the Mediterranean. Failure of supplies from home brought the expedition to grief, and after much suffering the fleet was recalled in July 1621. Gardiner's History of England, iv, 223-5.

³ On his return to Flushing with an English army in January 1624-5. Gardiner's History, v, 285.

Elizabeth, my eldest sister³, was married to Sir Henry Jones⁴ of Abermarles [Carmarthenshire], who had by her one son and two daughters; the latter end of her time was the most sickly and miserable that hath been known in our times; while, for the space of about fourteen years, she languished and pined away to skin and bones, and at last died in London, and lieth buried in a church called — near Cleapside. Margaret was married to John Vaughan, son and heir to Owen Vaughan of Llweddiarth⁵; by which match some former differences betwixt our house and that were appeased and reconciled⁶. He had by her three daughters and heirs, Dorothy⁷, Magdalen, and Katherine; of which the two latter only survive. The estate of the Vaughans yet went to the heirs-male, although not so clearly but that the entail which carried the said lands was questioned⁸. Frances, my young-

¹ 1625, September 25, Buckingham, as Admiral of the Narrow Seas, appointed Captain Thomas Herbert captain of the Dreadnought. Cal. State Papers, Dom. 1625-6, p. lxx.

² Lord Herbert's younger brother apparently died midway between 1626 and 1642. I have had the burial registers of the Church of St Martin's-in-the-Fields searched in vain for an entry respecting his death. The registers do not seem to have been kept with very scrupulous care at this period.

³ Baptized in Montgomery Church, 10th November 1583.

⁴ Sheriff of Carmarthenshire 1574 and 1584, and for Brecknockshire, 1580. Two letters of Sir Henry appear in the Stradling Correspondence, ed. Traherne, pp. 163, 164.

⁵ Entered in the Montgomery parish register, 3d November 1606.

⁶ On 7th January 1588-9, Shrewsbury was much disturbed by a conflict between the retainers of the Herbert and the Newport families, and those of the Vaughans. A tedious lawsuit between Sir Edward Herbert of Powis, third cousin of Lord Herbert's father, and the Vaughans seems to have involved all the Herbert family. Cf. Owen and Blakeway's Shrewsbury, i, 390, 391.

⁷ Dorothy's will was proved at Canterbury by her uncle, George Herbert, the poet, on 9th October 1632.

⁸ John Vaughan died before his wife. She died 14th August, 1623, and is buried in Montgomery Church, inter majores et consanguineos. She is described in the parish register as habitans Llustin in parochia Llan-cwelly in Diocesi Asaphensi.

est sister, was married to Sir John Brown, Knight, in Lincolnshire, who had by her divers children; the eldest son of whom, although young, fought divers duels, in one of which it was his fortune to kill one Lee, of a great family in Lancashire¹. I could say many things more concerning all these, but it is not my purpose to particularise their lives. I have related only some passages concerning them to the best of my memory, being assured I have not failed much in my relation of them. I shall now come to myself.

I was born at Eyton, in Shropshire² [being a house which, together with fair lands, descended upon the Newports by my said grandmother], between the hours of twelve and one of the clock in the morning³; my infancy was very sickly, my head continually purging itself very much by the ears; whereupon also it was so long before I began to speak, that many thought I should be ever dumb. The very furthest thing I remember, is, that when I understood what was said by others, I did yet forbear to speak, lest I should utter something that were imperfect or impertinent. When I came to talk, one of the furthest inquiries I made was, how I came into this world? I told my nurse, keeper, and others, I found myself here indeed, but from what cause or beginning, or by what means, I could not imagine; but for this, as I was

¹ Peter Legh, eldest son of Piers Legh of Lyme, Lancashire, by Anne, daughter of Sir John Savile, was killed in a duel in 1640. Baines' Lancashire, iii, 644.

² Owen and Blakeway's History of Shrewsbury, i, 278: 'Eyton [on Severn, near Wroxeter] was a very ancient possession of the monks of Shrewsbury, granted to them by their founder, Earl Roger, and it became one of the country seats of the abbot. On the dissolution it was purchased of the crown by Chief-Justice Bromley, whose only child conveyed it to her husband, Sir Richard Newport. Sir Richard made this beautiful spot one of his favourite residences. After the demolition of Ercall [another seat of the Newports], in the civil wars, Eyton became their chief seat'. Cf. Dugdale's Monasticon (1821), iii, 525, 529; Eyton's Shropshire, viii, 26-36. An engraving of the ruins of the Newport house at Eyton in 1876 appears in the Gentleman's Magazine for that year, Part I, p. 201. All that now remains is a garden wall, running along the side of a terrace, with a tower at the end.

³ Unfortunately the extant registers at Wroxeter, whence some information respecting Lord Herbert might have been expected, begin in 1613. The Oxford University Register states that Herbert was aged fourteen years in May 1596. He himself states (p. 22) that he was fifteen in 1598-9, and (p. 43) eighteen or nineteen in 1600. According to his opening remarks he was twelve years old (p. 2) when his father died (1596), and eight when his grandfather died (1593). These statements are too self-contradictory to prove anything. On the whole, I am inclined to regard 3d March 1582-3 as the date of his birth. That his birthday was 3d March appears from his own published verses:

In Diem Nalatiūm, viz., 3 Mar.

Vere novo lux usque redit quā nascor, et una

Dum tempus redit, et sit numerosa dies;

Ver, olim vires renovans roburque recendens,

Æ[s]tas fit tandem tristis hyemsque mihi.

laughed at by nurse, and some other women that were then present, so I was wondered at by others, who said, they never heard a child but myself ask that question ; upon which, when I came to riper years, I made this observation, which afterwards a little comforted me, that, as I found myself in possession of this life, without knowing anything of the pangs and throes my mother suffered, yet, doubtless, they did no less press and afflict me than her, so I hope my soul shall pass to a better life than this without being sensible of the anguish and pains my body shall feel in death. For as I believe then I shall be transmitted to a more happy estate by God's great grace, I am confident I shall no more know how I came out of this world, than how I came into it ; and because, since that time, I have made verses to this purpose, I have thought fit to insert them here as a place proper for them. The Argument is,

VITA ¹

PRIMA fuit quondam genitili semine vita
 Procurasse suas dotes, ubi plastica virtus
 Gestit, et vegeto molem perfundere succo,
 Externamque suo formam cohibere recessu,
 Dum conspirantes possint accedere causæ,
 Et totum tuto liceat proludere fœtum.

Altera materno tandem succrevit in arvo
 Exiles spumans ubi spiritus induit artus,
 Exertusque simul miro sensoria textu
 Cudit, et hospitium menti non vile paravit.
 Quæ cœlo delapsa suas mox inde capessat
 Partes, et sortis tanquàm præsaga futuræ
 Corrigit ignavum pondus, nec inutile sistat.
 Tertia nunc agitur, quæ scœna recluditur ingens,
 Cernitur et festum cœli, terræque theatrum :
 Congener et species, rerum variatæque forma ;
 Et circumferri, motu proprioque vagari
 Contigit, et leges æternæque fœdœra mundi
 Visere, et assiduo redeuntia sidera cursu.
 Unde etiam vitæ causas, nexumque tueri
 Fas erat et summum longè præsciscere Numen ;
 Dum varios miræ motus contemperat orbis,

¹ This and the following poem appeared in Lord Herbert's lifetime at the close of his De Causis Errorum (1645), together with a third Latin poem, Hæred. et Nepot. suis Præcepta et Auxilia. The first poem is much abbreviated here, and has undergone a few verbal alterations.

Et Pater, et Dominus, Custos, et conditor idem Audit ubique Deus ; Quid nî modò Quarta sequatur ?
 Sordibus excussis cùm mens jam purior instat,
 Auctaque doctrinis variis, virtuteque pollens
 Intendit vires, magis et sublimia spirat,
 Et tacitus cordi stimulus suffigitur imo,
 Ut velit huic quisquam sorti superesse caducæ,
 Expetiturque status felicior ambitiosis
 Ritibus, et sacris, et cultu religioso,
 Et nova succedit melioris conscia fati
 Spes superis hærens, toto perfusaque cœlo,
 Et scse sancto demittit Numen amori,
 Et data celestis non fallax tessera vitæ,
 Cumque Deo licuit nou uno jure pacisci,
 Ut mihi seu servo reddatur debita merces,
 Filius aut bona adire paterna petam, mihi sponsor
 Sit fidei Numen ; mox hanc sin exuo vitam,
 Compos jam factus melioris, tuum simulatû
 Jure meo cupiam liber, meque asserit inde
 Ipse Deus (cujus non terris gratia tantùm, Sed Cœlis prostat) quid nî modo quinta sequatur,
 Et Sexta, et quicquid tandem spes ipsa requirat ?

DE VITA CELESTI CONJECTURA

Toto lustratus genio mihi gratulor ipsi,
 Fati securus, dum nec terroribus ullis
 Dejicior, tacitos coudo vel corde dolores,
 Sed lætus mediis arumnis transigo vitam,
 Invitisque nialis (quæ terras undique cingunt)
 Ardenti virtute viam super æthera quærens,
 Proxima Cœlestis præcepi præmia vitæ,
 Ultima prætento, divino nixus amore,
 Quò simul exuperans erepere ludibria sortis,
 Barbara vesani linquo consortia Sæcli,
 Auras infernas defflans, spiransque supernas,
 Dum sanetis memet totum sic implico flammis,
 Hiscæ ut suffultus penetrem laquearia cœli,
 Atq. novi latè speculer magnalia Mundi,
 Et notas animas, proprio jam lumine pulehras
 Invisam, Superùmque choros, mentesque beatas,
 Quæis aveam miscere ignes, ac vincula sacra,
 Atq. vice alternâ transire in gaudia, Cœlum
 Quæ dederit cunetis, ipsis aut indita nobis,
 Vel quæ communi voto sancire licbit,
 Ut Deus interea cumulans sua præmia, nostrum
 Augeat inde deus, proprioque illustret amore,
 Nec Cœli Cœlis desint, æternavè Vitæ

Sæcula, vel Sæclis nova gaudia, qualia totum
 Ævum nec minuat, nec terminat Infinitum.
 His major desit nec gratia Numinis alma,
 Quæ miris variata modis hæc gaudia crescant,
 Excipiatque statum quemvis felicior alter;
 Et quæ nec sperare datur sint præstita nobis,
 Nec, nisi sola capit quæ mens divina, supersint;
 Quæ licet ex sese sint perfectissima longæ,
 Ex nobis saltem magè condecorata videntur:
 Cum segnes animas, cælum quas indit ab ortu,
 Exacuat tantum labor ac industria nostra;
 Ac demum poliat doctrina, et moribus illis,
 Ut redeant pulchræ, dotem cœloque reportent:
 Quum simul arbitriis usi, mala pellimus illa,
 Quæ nec vel pepulit cælum, vel pelleret olim,
 Ex nobis ita fit jam gloria Numinis ingens,
 Auctior in cœlos quoque gloria nostra redundat,
 Et quæ virtuti sint debita præmia, tandem
 Vel Numen solito reddunt felicius ipsum.
 Amplior unde simul redhibetur Gratia nobis,
 Ut vel pro voto nostro jam singula cedant.
 Nam si libertas cara est, per amœna locorum
 Conspicua innumeris Cœlis discurrere fas est,
 Deliciasq. loci cujusvis carpere passim.
 Altior est animo si contemplatio fixa,
 Cuncta adaperata patent nobis jam scrinia Cœli,
 Arcausque Dei rationes nôsse juvabit:
 Hujus sin repetat quisquam consortia sæcli,
 Mox agere in terris, ac procurare licebit
 Res hæc humanas, et justis legibus uti!
 Sin magè cœlesti jam delectamur amore,
 Solvimur in flammæ, quæ se lambuntq. fovantq.
 Mutuò, et impliciti sanctis ardoribus, unâ
 Surgimus amplexi, copulâ junctique tenaci,
 Partibus, et toto miscemur ubique vicissim;
 Ardoresque novos accendit Numinis ardor.
 Sin laudare Deum lubeat, nos laudat et ipse,
 Concinit Angelicusque chorus, modulamine suavi
 Personat et cælum, prostant et publica nobis
 Gaudia, et eduntur passim spectacula læta;
 Fitque theatralis quasi Cœli machina tota.
 Hanc mundi molem sin vis replicaverit ingens
 Numinis, atque novas formas exculperit inde
 Dotibus ornatas aliis, magis atque capaces;
 Nostras mox etiam formas renovare licebit,
 Et dots sensusque alios assumere, tandem
 Consummata magis quo gaudia nostra resurgant,
 Hæc si conjecto mortali corpore fretus
 Corpus ut exuerim, Quid ni majora recludam?

And certainly since in my mother's womb this plastica, or formatrix, which formed my eyes, ears, and other senses, did not intend them for that dark and noisome place, but, as being conscious of a better life, made them as fitting organs to apprehend and perceive those things which should occur in this world: so I believe, since my coming into this world my soul hath formed or produced certain faculties which are almost as useless for this life, as the above-named senses were for the mother's womb; and these faculties are, hope, faith, love, and joy, since they never rest or fix upon any transitory or perishing object in this world, as extending themselves to something further than can be here given, and indeed acquiesce only in the perfect, eternal, and infinite: I confess they are of some use here; yet I appeal to everybody, whether any worldly felicity did so satisfy their hope here, that they did not wish and hope for something more excellent, or whether they had ever that faith in their own wisdom, or in the help of man, that they were not constrained to have recourse to some diviner and superior power, than they could find on earth, to relieve them in their danger or necessity; whether ever they could place their love on any earthly beauty, that it did not fade and wither, if not frustrate or deceive them, or whether ever their joy was so consummate in anything they delighted in, that they did not want much more than it, or indeed this world can afford, to make them happy. The proper objects of these faculties, therefore, though framed, or at least appearing in this world, is God only, upon whom faith, hope, and love, were never placed in vain, or remain long unrequited¹. But to leave these discourses, and come to my childhood again.

I remember this defluxion at my ears above-mentioned continued in that violence, that my friends did not think fit to teach me so much as my alphabet until I was seven years old, at which time my defluxion ceased, and left me free of the disease my ancestors were subject unto, being the epilepsy. My schoolmaster in the house of my said lady grandmother began then to teach me the alphabet, and afterwards grammar, and other books commonly read in schools; in which I profited so much, that upon this theme Audaces fortuna juvat, I made an oration of a sheet of paper, and fifty or sixty verses in the space of one day. I remember in that time I was corrected sometimes for going to cuffs with two schoolfellows being both elder than myself, but never for telling a lie or any other fault; my natural disposition and inclination being so contrary to all falsehood, that being demanded whether I had committed any fault whereof I might be justly suspected, I did use ever to confess it freely, and thereupon choosing rather to suffer correction than to stain my mind with telling a lie, which I did judge then, no time could ever deface; and I can affirm to all the world truly, that, from my first infancy to this hour, I told not willingly anything that was false, my soul naturally having an antipathy to lying and deceit. After I had attained the age of nine, during all which time I lived in mysaid ladygrandmother's house at Eyton, my parents thought fit to send me to some place where I might learn the Welsh tongue, as believing it necessary to enable me to treat with those of my friends and tenants who understood no other language; whereupon I was recommended to Mr. Edward Thelwall, of Plas-y-ward in Denbighshire¹. This gentleman I must remember with honour, as having of himself acquired the exact knowledge of Greek, Latin, French, Italian, and Spanish, and all other learning, having for that purpose neither gone beyond seas, nor so much as had the benefit of any universities. Besides, he was of that rare temper in governing his choler, that I never saw him angry during the time of my stay there, and have heard so much of him for many years before. When occasion of offence was given him, I have seen him redden in the face, and after remain for a while silent, but when he spake, his words were so calm and gentle, that I found he had digested his choler, though yet I confess I could never attain that perfection, as being subject over to choler and passion more than I ought, and generally to speak my mind freely, and indeed rather to imitate those, who, having fire within doors, choose rather to give it vent than suffer it to burn the house. I command yet much more the manner of Mr. Thelwall; and, certainly, he that can forbear speaking for some while, will remit much of his passion; but as I could not learn much of him in this kind, so I did as little profit in learning the Welsh, or any other of those languages that worthy gentleman understood, as having a tertian ague for the most part of nine months, which was all the time I stayed in his house.

¹ See the Introduction for a discussion of Lord Herbert's philosophical system.

¹ Son and heir of Symond Thelwall, one of the Councillors of the Marches of Wales. He named one of his sons Herbert, doubtless after his pupil. He died 29th July 1610. His brother Eubule was Principal of Jesus College, Oxford, 1621-30. Dwnn's Visitations, 1566-1613, ed. Meyrick, ii, 335, 336.

Having recovered my strength again, I was sent, being about the age of ten, to be taught by one Mr. Newton at Diddlebury in Shropshire¹, where, in the space of less than two years, I not only recovered all I had lost in my sickness, but attained to the knowledge of the Greek tongue and logic, inasmuch, that at twelve years old my parents thought fit to send me to Oxford to University College², where I remember to have disputed at my first coming in logic, and to have made in Greek the exercises required in that college, oftener than in Latin. I had not been many months in the University, but news was brought me of my father's death, his sickness being a lethargy, *caros*³, or coma vigilans, which continued long upon him; he seemed at last to die without much pain, though in his senses⁴. Upon opinion given by physicians that his disease was mortal, my mother thought fit to send for me home, and presently, after my father's death, to desire her brother Sir Francis Newport to haste to London to obtain my wardship for his and her use jointly, which he obtained⁵. Shortly after I was sent again to my studies in Oxford, where I had not been long but that an overture for a match with the daughter and heir of Sir William Herbert of St. Julian's⁶ was made, the occasion whereof was this: Sir William Herbert being heir-male to the old Earl of Pembroke above-mentioned by a younger son of his (for the eldest son had a daughter, who carried away those great possessions the Earl of Worcester now

¹ Doubtless Thomas Newton, eldest son of Edward Newton, of Barley, Cheshire; a graduate of both Cambridge and Oxford, and a well-known classical scholar. He 'taught school', says Wood, 'at Macclesfield, or near it, with good success'. He died in May 1607 (see Wood's Athenæ Oxon., ed. Bliss, ii, 5). Diddlebury is near Macclesfield.

² Matriculated as a gentleman-commoner in May 1596, aged fourteen years (Oxford University Register, Oxford Historical Society II, ii, 214); 'being put under the tuition of an eminent tutor'. (Wood's Athenæ Oxon., ed. Bliss, iii, 239.)

³ In old medical books carus or carosis is applied to various kinds of coma.

⁴ He was buried in Montgomery Church, 15th October 1596.

⁵ The wardship was not obtained by Newport, but by his kinsman Sir George More, afterwards Donne's father-in-law. Kempe's Loseley MSS., p. 347. (See Appendix VI below).

⁶ Between Caerleon and Newport. Thomas Churchyard, in his Worthines of Wales (1587), says: 'Saint Gyllians is a fair house where Sir William Harbert dwelles'.

holds in Monmouthshire, as I said before), having one only daughter surviving, made a will, whereby he estated all his possessions in Monmouthshire and Ireland upon his said daughter, upon condition she married one of the surname of Herbert, otherwise the said lands to descend to the heirs-male of the said Sir William; and his daughter to have only a small portion out of the lands he had in Anglesey and Carnarvonshire; his lands being thus settle, Sir William died shortly afterwards¹. He was a man much conversant with books, and especially given to the study of divinity, insomuch, that he writ an Exposition upon the Revelations, which is printed²; though some thought he was as far from finding the sense thereof as he was from attaining the philosopher's stone, which was another part of his study³; howsoever, he was very understanding in all others things, he was noted yet to be of a very high mind; but I can say little of him, as having never seen his person, nor otherwise had much information concerning him. His daughter and heir, called Mary⁴, after her father died, continued unmarried until she was one-and-twenty; none of the Herberts appearing in all that time, who, either in age or fortune, was fit to match her. About this time I had attained the age of fifteen⁵, and a match at last being proposed, yet, notwithstanding the disparity of years betwixt us, upon the eight-and-twentieth of February 1598 [-9], in the house of Eyton, where the same man, vicar of ———, married my father and mother, christened and married me, I espoused her. Not long after my marriage I went again to Oxford, ¹ He died at St Julian's, 4th March 1592-3, and was buried at Monmouth a week later. Powysland Coll., xi, 364.

² A Letter written by a true Christian Catholike to a Romaine pretended Catholike vpon occasion of controuersie touching the Catholike Church: the 12, 13, and 14 chapters of the Revelations are breifly and trulie expounded. London, John Windet, 1586. Small 4to. 86 pp. The book is anonymous, but Sir William's arms are at the back of the title-page. A copy is in the British Museum. The interpretation is very quaint and unconvincing. Ames refers to the book under the author's name, and credits him with another work, Sidney or Baripenthes (1586), a poem on the death of Sir Philip Sidney. Typograph. Antiquities, ed. Herbert, p. 1226. (See also Strype's Parker, ii, 166; and Wood's Athenæ, ed. Bliss, ii, 483.)

³ Sir William was the intimate friend of Dr. Dee, and took a house at Mortlake in 1581 in order to pursue his studies in astrology and alchemy with the doctor. See Dr. Dee's Diary, published by Camden Society, pp. 3, 20, etc.

⁴ The earliest reference to Lord Herbert's wife is in Dr. Dee's Diary, under date 22d January 1581-2: 'Arthur Dee (b. 19th July 1579) and Mary Herbert, they being but 3 yere old the eldest, did make, as it wer, a shew of childish marriage, of calling each other husband and wife' (p. 14).

⁵ See p. 13, note 3. The age is probably seventeen.

together with my wife and mother, who took a house, and lived for some certain time there¹, and now, having a due remedy for that lasciviousness to which youth is naturally inclined, I followed my book more close than ever, in which course I continued until I attained about the age of eighteen, when my mother took a house in London, between which place and Montgomery Castle I passed my time till I came to the age of one-and-twenty, having in that space divers children, I having now none remaining but Beatrice, Richard, and Edward. During this time of living in the University or at home, I did, without any master or teacher, attain the knowledge of the French, Italian, and Spanish languages, by the help of some books in Latin or English translated into those idioms, and the dictionaries of those several languages; I attained also to sing my part at first sight in music, and to play on the lute with very little or almost no teaching;—my intention in learning languages being to make myself a citizen of the world as far as it were possible; and my learning of music was for this end, that I might entertain myself at home, and together refresh my mind after my studies, to which I was exceedingly inclined, and that I might not need the company of young men, in whom I obserbed in those times much ill example and debauchery².

Being gotten thus far into my age, I shall give some observations concerning ordinary education, even from the first infancy till the departure from the University; as being desirous, together with the narration of my life, to deliver such rules as I conceive may be useful to my posterity. And first, I find, that in the infancy those diseases are to be remedied which may be hereditary unto them on either side; so that, if they be subject to the stone or gravel, I do conceive it will be good for the nurse sometimes to drink posset drinks, in which are boiled such things as are good to expel gravel and stone; the child also himself when he comes to some age may use the same posset drinks of herbs, as milium solis¹, saxifragia², etc., good for the stone many are reckoned by the physicians, of which also myself could bring a large catalogue, but rather leave it to those who are expert in that art. The same course is to be taken for the gout; for which purpose I do much commend the bathing of children's legs and feet in the water wherein smiths quench their iron³, as also water wherein alum hath been infused, or boiled, as also the decoction of juniper berries, bay berries, chamædryas⁴, chemæpitys⁵, which baths also are good for those that are hereditarily subject to the palsy, for these things do much strengthen the sinews; as also olinum castorii, and sucini⁶, which are not to be used without advice. They that are also subject to the spleen from their ancestors, ought to use those herbs that are splenetics: and those that are troubled with the falling sickness, with cephaniques, of which certainly I should have had need but for the purging of my ears above mentioned. Briefly, what disease soever it be that is derived from ancestors of either side, it will be necessary first to give such medicines to the nurse as may make her milk effectual for those purposes; as also afterwards to give unto the child itself such specific remedies as his age and constitution will bear. I could say much more upon this point, as having delighted ever in the knowledge of herbs, plants, and gums, and in few words the history of nature, insomuch, that coming to apothecaries' shops, it was my ordinary manner when I looked upon the bills filed up, containing the physicians' prescriptions, to tell every man's disease; howbeit, I shall not presume in these particulars to prescribe to my posterity, though I believe I know the best receipts for almost all diseases, but shall leave them to the expert physician; only I will recommend again to my posterity the curing of hereditary diseases in the very infancy, since, otherwise, without much difficulty, they will never be cured.

¹ Walton says Lady Herbert lived for four years at Oxford. (See Appendix III).

² One is reminded of Sir Philip Sidney's advice to his brother to give good heed to the learning of music. Sidney always regretted that he himself had neglected it in youth. 'You will not believe what a want I find of it in my melancholy times'. Sidney Papers, I, s 83-285. 'First-rate accomplishment in music was not very common: Pattenham says in his Art of Poesie—"It is hard to find in these dayes of noblemen or gentlemen any excellent musician" (p. 16).

¹ 'Gromell [i.e. Gromwell, or grey millet] is called in shops and among the Italians miliun solis'.—Gerard's Herbal (1597), p. 487.

² Wall spleenwort, or stone-breaker, so named from the belief that it was capable of dissolving stones in the bladder. Gerard, p. 891.

³ Gervase Markham, in his English Huswife (1616), p. 28, recommends wine in which a red hot 'lump of yron or Steele has been quenched'. Many other homely prescriptions resembling those suggested by Lord Herbert are met with in Markham's book.

⁴ Wall or tree germander. Gerard, p. 523.

⁵ Ground pine, or herb ivy. Gerard, p. 422.

⁶ Oil of amber.

When children go to school, they should have one to attend them, who may take care of their manners, as well as the school-master doth of their learning; for among boys all vice is easily learned; and here I could wish it constantly observed, that neither the master should correct him for faults of his manners, nor his governor for manners for the faults in his learning. After the alphabet is taught, I like well the shortest and clearest grammars, and such books into which all the Greek and Latin words are severally contribed, in which kind one Comenius¹ hath given an example: this being done, it would be much better to proceed with Greek authors than with Latin; for as it is as easy to learn at first the one as the other, it would be much better to give the first impressions into the child's memory of those things which are more rare than usual: therefore I would have them begin at Greek first, and the rather that there is not that art in the world whercin the Greeks have not excelled and gone before others; so that when you look upon philosophy, astronomy, mathematics, medicine, and briefly all learning, the Greeks have exceeded all nations². When he shall be ready to go to the University, it will be fit also his governor for manners go along with him; it being the frail nature of youth, as they grow to ripeness in age, to be more capable of doing ill, unless their manners be well guided, and themselves by degrees habituated in virtue, with which if once they acquaint themselves, they will find more pleasure in it than ever they can do in vice; since everybody loves virtuous persons, whereas the vicious do scarce love one another. For this purpose, it will be necessary that you keep the company of grave, learned men, who are of good reputation, and hear rather what they say, and follow why they do, than follow the examples of young, wild, and rash persons; and certainly of those two parts which are to be acquired in youth, whereof one is goodness and virtuous manners, the other learning and knowledge, I shall so much prefer the first before the second, as I shall ever think virtue, accompanied with ordinary discretion, will make his way better both to happiness in this world and the next, than any puffed knowledge which would cause him to be insolent and vainglorious, or minister, as it were, arms and advantages to him for doing a mischief: so that it is pity that wicked dispositions should have knowledge to acute their ill intentions, or courage to maintain them; that fortitude which should defend all a man's virtues, being never well employed to defend his humours, passions, or vices. I do not approve for elder brothers that course of study which is ordinary used in the University, which is, if their parents perchance intend they shall stay there four or five years, to employ the said time as if they meant to proceed masters of art and doctors in some science; for which purpose, their tutors commonly spend much time in teaching them the subtleties of logic, which, as it is usually practised¹, enables them for little more than to be excellent wranglers, which art, though it may be tolerable in a mercenary lawyer, I can by no means commend in a sober and well-governed gentleman. I approve much those part of logic which teach men to deduce their proofs from firm and undoubted principles, and show men to distinguish betwixt truth and falsehood, and help them to discover fallacies, sophisms, and that which the schoolmen call vicious argumentations, concerning which I shall not here enter into a long discourse. So much of logic as may serve for this purpose being acquired, some good sum of philosophy may be learned, which may teach him both the ground of the Platonic and Aristotelian philosophy. After which it will not be amiss to read the *Idea Medicinæ Philosophicæ*², written by Severinus (Dannus), there being many things considerable concerning the Paracelsian principles written in that book, which are not to be found in former writers; it will not be amiss also to read over Franciscus Patricius ¹, and Telesius ², who have examined and controverted the ordinary Peripatetic doctrine; all which may be performed in one year, that term being enough for philosophy, as I conceive, and six months for logic, for I am confident a man may have quickly more than he needs of these two arts. These being attained, it will be requisite to study geography with exactness, so much as may teach a man the situation of all countries in the whole world, together with which, it will, be fit to learn something concerning the governments, manners, religions, either ancient or new, as also the interests of states, and relations in amity, or strength in which they stand to their neighbours; it will be necessary also, at the same time, to learn the use of the celestial globe, the studies of both globes being complicated and joined together. I do not conceive yet the knowledge of judicial astrology so necessary, but only for general predictions; particular events being neither intended by nor collected out of the stars ³. It will be also fit to learn arithmetic and geometry in some good measure, but especially arithmetic, it being most useful for many purposes and, among the rest, for keeping accounts, whereof here is much use. As for the knowledge of lines, superficieses, and bodies ⁴, though it be a science of much certainty and demonstration, it is not much useful for a gentleman, unless it be to understand fortifications, and knowledge whereof is worthy of those who intend the wars; though yet he must remember,

¹ In the Janua Linguarum (1st ed. 1631) of John Amos Comenius the equivalents of common phrases in different languages were arranged side by side in parallel columns. The book was frequently published in an English version, known as the Gate of Tongues; of which some editions dealt with the Latin, Greek, and English, and others solely with modern languages.

² Cf. Ascham's Schoolmaster, ed. Mayor, p. 52: 'And trowelie, if there be any good in them [i.e. Latin and modern writings], it is either lerned, borowed, or stolne from some one of these worthele wittes in Athens'. Ascham's marginal note runs: 'Lernyng chiefly conteyned in the Greke, and in no other tong'.

¹ Bacon repeatedly complains that logic and rhetoric, 'arts fitter for graduates than children and novices', were begun by scholars at the universities at too early an age, and that, as a consequence, they had degenerated into 'ridiculous affectation', and their wisdom become contemptible.—Advancement of Learning, in Spedding's ed., Book II, p. 601.

² . . . fundamenta continens intus doctrinæ Paracelsicæ, Hippocraticæ et Galenicæ', Basle, 1571; Erfurt, 1616; Hagæ Comitum, 1660. The author, Peter Severin, the most celebrated champion of Paracelsian medicine in the sixteenth century, was doctor to the King of Denmark, and died in 1602. Cf. Bacon's De Augmentis, lib. iii, in Spedding's edition of the Philosophical Works, i, 564.

¹ Francis Patricius, 'qui Platonicorum fumos sublinavit', is well known for his inefficient attacks on Aristotle in his Discussiones Peripateticæ (1571 and 1581). See Bacon's De Augmentis, ed. Spedding, I, 564.

² Telesius of Cosenza (b. 1509) wrote De Rerum Natura, (1565 and 1586). This work greatly influenced Bacon, who repeatedly refers to it in his philosophical books. In the De Augmentis Bacon says of Telesius, 'Parmenidis philosophiam Instaurans arina Peripateticorum in illos ipsos vertit'. See Bacon's De Principiis atque Originibus, and R. L. Ellis's introduction to the treatise in Spedding's edition, III, 74 et seq.

³ Cf. Herbert's Religio Gentilium (1663), cap. viii, p. 49. 'Hæc (i.e. stellæ) consulat sapiens, non quidem juxta superstitiosas et vulgares astrologorum formulas, sed ex eventuum observatione, ubi earum motus, conjunctiones, oppositiones, et aspectus varii inter se comparantur'. See also Herbert's Dialogue, p. 179:—'When it [i.e. astrology] is rightly understood and applied, it be not only a lawful, but a most necessary art for a wise man; as long as he takes only general predictions from thence, without presuming to foretell particular and single events, otherwise than, as they depended upon the general causes, since they who descend too far into particulars either err or speak truth by chance'.

⁴ Of mathematics Lord Herbert writes in A Dialogue between a Tutor and a Pupil: 'I told you also the end of this mathematical doctrine was but ignoble in respect of other [sciences] as tending only to the measuring of heights, depths, and distances, or the making of some excellent engines and the like; all which are of so mean consideration that they can be no ways esteemed as objects adequated or proportioned to the dignity of our souls, whose speculations reach much further' (p. 2). Lord Herbert seems totally ignorant of the higher pure mathematics.

that whatsoever art doth in way of defence, art likewise, in way of assailing, can destroy. This study hath cost me much labour, but as yet I could never find how any place could be so fortified, but that there were means, in certain opposite lines, to prevent or subvert all that could be done in that kind. It will become a gentleman to have some knowledge in medicine, especially the diagnostic part, whereby he may take timely notice of a disease, and by that means timely prevent it, as also the prognostic part, whereby he may judge of the symptoms either increasing or decreasing in the disease, as also concerning the crisis or indication thereof. This art will get a gentleman not only much knowledge, but much credit; since seeing any sick body, he will be able to tell, in all human probability, whether he shall recover, or if he shall die of the disease, to tell what signs shall go before, and what the conclusion will be; it will become him also to know not only the ingredients, but doses, of certain cathartic or purging, emetic or vomitive medicines, specific or choleric, melancholic, or phlegmatic constitutions, phlebotomy being only necessary for those who abound in blood. Besides, I would have a gentleman know how to make these medicines himself, and afterwards prepare them with his own hands; it being the manner of apothecaries so frequently to put in the succedanea, that no man is sure to find with them medicines made with the true drugs which ought to enter into the composition when it is exotic or rare; or when they are extant in the shop, no man can be assured that the said drugs are not rotten, or that they have not lost their natural force and virtue. I have studied this art very much also, and have, in case of extremity, ministered physic with that success which is strange, whereof I shall give two or three examples: Richard Griffiths of Sutton, my servant, being sick of a malignant pestilent fever¹, and tried in vain all our country physicians could do, and his water at last stinking so grievously, which physicians note to be a sign of extension of natural heat, and consequently of present² death, I was entreated to see him, when as yet he had neither eaten, drank, slept, or known anybody for the space of six or seven days; whereupon demanding whether the physicians had given him over, and it being answered unto me that they had, I said it would not be amiss to give him the quantity of an hazel-nut of a certain rare receipt which I had, assuring that if anything in the world could recover him, that would: of which I was so confident, that I would come the next day at four of the clock in the afternoon unto him, and at that time I doubted not but they should find signs of amendment, provided they should put the doses I gave them, being about the bigness of a nut, down his throat; which being done with much difficulty, I came the morrowafter at the hour appointed, when, to the wonder of his family, he knew me, and asked for some broth, and not long after recovered. My cousin, Athelston Owen, also of Rhiew Saeson,¹ having an hydrocephale also in that extremity that his eyes began to start out of his head, and his tongue to come out of his mouth, and his whole head finally exceeding its natural proportion, insomuch that his physicians likewise left him; I prescribed to him the decoction of two diuretic roots, which after he had drank four or five days, he urined in that abundance that his head by degrees returned to its ancient figure, and all other signs of health appeared; whereupon also he wrote a letter to me, that he was so suddenly and perfectly restored to his former health, that it seemed more like a miracle than a cure; for those are the very words in the letter he sent me. I cured a great lady in London of an issue of blood, when all the physicians had given her over, with so easy a medicine, that the lady herself was astounded to find the effects thereof. I could give more examples in this kind, but these shall suffice; I will for the rest deliver a rule I conceive for finding out the best receipts not only for curing all inward but outward hurts, such as are ulcers, tumours, contusions, wounds, and the like: you must look upon all pharmacopæias or antidotaries² of several countries, of which sort I have in my library the *Pharmacopæia Londinensis*³, *Parisiensis*⁴, *Amstelredamensis*⁵,

¹ A case of typhus fever.

² Immediate.

¹ In the hundred of Cyvelliog, Montgomeryshire. Athelston was the son of Maurice Owen by Elizabeth, daughter of Matthew Herbert of Dolguog, Lord Herbert's uncle.

² Antidotaries were properly collections of antidote-recipes, but the term was often used synonymously with Dispensary or Dispensatorium, i.e. a general collection of simple medical prescriptions. See Dr. Murray's English Dictionary.

³ First edition, called PRIMA, 1618; second edition, called SECUNDA, 1650.

⁴ Codex Medicamentarius seu Pharmacopœia Parisiensis, editore Phil. Harduino, Paris, 1639.

⁵ 1636.

that of Quercetanus ¹, Bauderonus ², Renodæus ³, Valerius Cordus ⁴ Pharmacopœia Coloniensis ⁵, Augustana ⁶, Venetiana, ⁷ Vononiensis, Florentina, Romana, Messancensis ⁸; in some of which are told not only what the receipts here set down are good for, but the doses of them. The rule I here give is, that what all the said dispensatories, antidotaries, or pharmacopœis prescribe as effectual for overcoming a disease is certainly good; for as they are set forth by the authority of the physicians of these several countries, what they all ordain must necessarily be effectual: but they who will follow my advice shall find in that little short antidotary called Amstelodamensis, not long since put forth, almost all that is necessary to be known for curing of diseases, wounds, etc. There is a book called Aurora Medicorum, very fit to be read in this kind ⁹. Among writers of physic, I do especially commend, after Hippocrates and Galen, Fernelius, ¹⁰ Lud. Mercatus ¹¹, and Dan. Sennertus ¹², and Heurinius: ¹³ I could name many more, but I conceive these may suffice. As for the chemic or spagyric medicines, I cannot commend them to the use of my posterity; there being neither emetic, cathartic, diaphoretic, diuretic medicines extant among them, which are not much more happily and safely performed by vegetables; but hercof enough, since I pretend no further than to give some few directions to my

¹ Josephus Quercetanus or Du Chesne, a voluminous writer, published a Pharmacopœia Dogmaticorum Restituta, 1607, 4to, Paris. He was the chief French champion of Paracelsian medicine.

² Brice Bauderon, Pharmacopœia et Praxis Medica, 1620, Paris. This work was issued by Philemou Holland, together with J. Du Boy's Pharmacopœia Parisiensis Observationes, in London in 1639.

³ Joannes Renodæus, Dispensatorium Medicum et Antidotarium, 1600, 4to, Paris; Geneva, 1645. An English translation by Richard Tomlinson was published in London in 1657.

⁴ Valerius Cordus, Dispensatorium. Antw. 1568; Leyden, 1637.

⁵ Dispensarium usuale pro Pharmacopœis . . . reipubl. Coloniz, Cologne, 1565. Pharmacopœia sive Dispensatorium Coloniense, Cologne, 1627.

⁶ Pharmacopœias were issued at Augsburg in 1573, 1597, 1623, 1643.

⁷ Pharmacopœia a Medicorum Vendorum Collegio Comprobata, Curtio Martinello autore, Venice, 1617.

⁸ Antidotarium Speciale sacre Domus Magni Hospitalis urbis Messanae, by Placidus Truglio, Venice, 1642.

⁹ Probably Aurora Thesaurusque Philosophorum Theoph. Paracelsi, by Paracelsus' pupil, Gerard Dorn. Basle 1577, and Frankfurt 1585.

¹⁰ Johannes Fernelius (physician to Henry II of France) published Opera Medicinalia et Universa Medicina, 1564, 4to, and 1577, fol.

¹¹ Ludovici Mercatus (physician to Philip II and III of Spain) was author of Opera Medica et Chirurgica, fol. Franco. 1620.

¹² Daniel Sennert (1572-1637), an eminent German doctor, published Institutionum Medicinae, Lib. v, Wittenberg, 1611 and 1628.

¹³ Jan van Heurn (1543-1601), a well-known Dutch doctor, was the author of many practical treatises issued between 1587 and 1609.

posterity. In the meanwhile, I conceive it is a fine study, and worthy a gentleman to be a good botanic, that so he may know the nature of all herbs and plants, being our fellow-creatures, and made for the use of man¹; for which purpose it will be fit for him to cull out of some good herbal all the icones² together, with the descriptions of them, and to lay by themselves all such as grow in England, and afterwards to select again such as usually grow by the highway-side, in meadows, by rivers, or in marshes, or in cornfields, or in dry and mountainous places, or on rocks, walls, or in shady places, such as grow by the sea-side; for this being done, and the said icones being ordinarily carried by themselves, or by their servants, one may presently find out every herb he meets withal, especially if the said flowers be truly coloured³. Afterwards it will not be amiss to distinguish by themselves such herbs as are in gardens, and are exotics, and are transplanted hither. As for those plants which will not endure our climate, though the knowledge of them be worthy of a gentleman, and the virtues of them be fit to be learned, especially if they be brought over to a druggist as medicinal, yet the icones of them are not so pertinent to be known as the former, unless it be where there is less danger of adulterating the said medicaments; in which case, it is good to have recourse to not only the botanics, but also to Gesner's Dispensatory⁴, and to Aurora Medicorum, above mentioned, being books which make a man distinguish betwixt good and bad drugs: And this much of medicine may not only be useful but delectable to a gentleman, since which way soever he passeth, he may find something to entertain him. I must no less commend the study of anatomy, which whosoever considers, I believe will never be an atheist; the frame of man's body and coherence of his parts being so strange and paradoxal, that I hold it to be the greatest miracle of nature; though

¹ 'I could tell you also of many other strange herbs, but had rather you should read them in herbals, the greatest knowledge of them being a thing I much recommend unto you' (Dialogue, p. 172).

² i.e. icones, plates.

³ In 1639 Thomas Johnson, the learned editor of Gerard's Herbal, undertook, with companions, the first professedly botanical tour in Wales. From Machynlleth the travellers went through Montgomeryshire, and at Montgomery Castle were hospitably received and entertained by Lord Herbert. In the neighbourhood, 'inter Dudston (Dudeston) et Guarthelow', they gathered Solidaginem etiam Saracenicam, one of our rarest British plants (Powysland, Collections, xi, 370).

⁴ Conrad Gesner's Apparatus et Delectus Simplicium Medicamentorum, Leyden, 1542.

when all is done, I do not find she hath made it so much as proof against one disease, lest it should be thought to have made it no less than a prison to the soul.

Having thus passed over all human literature, it will be fit to say something of moral virtues and theological learning. As for the first, since the Christians and the heathens are in a manner agreed concerning the definitions of virtues, it would not be inconvenient to begin with those definitions which Aristotle in his Morals hath given, as being confirmed for the most part by the Platonics, Stoics, and other philosophers, and in general by the Christian Church, as well as all nations in the world whatsoever; they being doctrines imprinted in the soul in its first original, and containing the principal and first notices by which man may attain his happiness here or hereafter; there being no man that is given to vice that doth not find much opposition both in his own conscience, and in the religion and law as taught elsewhere; and this I dare say, that a virtuous man may not only go securely through all the religions¹, but all the laws in the world, and whatsoever obstructions he meet, obtain both an inward peace and outward welcome among all with whom he shall negotiate or converse; this virtue, therefore, I shall recommend to my posterity as the greatest perfection he can attain unto in this life, and the pledge of eternal happiness hereafter; there being none that can justly hope of an union with the supreme God, that doth not come as near to him in this life in virtue and goodness as he can; so that if human frailty do interrupt this union, by committing faults that make him incapable of his everlasting happiness it will be fit, by a serious repentance, to expiate and emaculate those faults, and for the rest, trust to the mercy of God his Creator, Redeemer, and Preserver, who being our Father, and knowing well in what a weak condition through infirmities we are, will, I doubt not, commiserate those transgressions we commit when they are done without desire to offend his Divine Majesty, and together rectify our understanding through his grace: since we commonly sin through no other cause, but that we mistook a true good for that which was only apparent, and so were deceived, by making an undue election in the objects proposed to us ; wherein, though it will be fit for every man to confess that he hath offended an infinite Majesty and Power, yet, as upon better consideration, he finds he did not mean infinitely to offend, there will be just reason to believe that God will not inflict an infinite punishment upon him if he be truly penitent, so that his justice may be satisfied, if not with man's repentance, yet at least with some temporal punishment here or hereafter, such as may be proportionable to the offence ; though I cannot deny but when man would infinitely offend God in a despiteful and contemptuous way, it will be but just that he suffer an infinite punishment ; but as I hope none are so wicked as to sin purposely, and with an high hand against the eternal Majesty of God ; so when they shall commit any sins out of frailty, I shall believe, either, that unless they be finally impenitent, and, (as they say, sold ingeniously over to sin) God's mercy will accept of their endeavours to return into a right way, and so make their peace with him by all those good means that are possible. Having thus recommended the learning of moral philosophy and practice of virtue, as the most necessary knowledge and useful exercise of man's life, I shall observe, that even in the employing of our virtues, discretion is required ; for every virtue is not promiscuously to be used, but such only as is proper for the present occasion. Therefore, though a wary and discreet wisdom be most useful where no imminent danger appears, yet, where an enemy draweth his sword against you, you shall have most use of fortitude, prevention being too late, when the danger is so pressing. On the other side, there is no occasion to use your fortitude against wrongs done by women or children, or ignorant persons, that I may say nothing of those that are much your superiors, who are magistrates, etc., since you might by a discreet wisdom have declined the injury, or when it were too late to do so, you may with more equal mind support that which is done, either by authority in the one, or frailty in the other. And certainly to such kind of person's forgiveness will be proper ; in which kind I am confident no man to my time hath exceeded me ; for though whensoever my honour hath been engaged, no man hath ever been more forward to hazard his life, yet where, with my honour I could forgive, I never used revenge, as leaving it always to God, who, the less I punish mine enemies will inflict so much the more punishment on them¹; and to this forgiveness of others three considerations have especially invited me.

¹ This is the view so admirably insisted on in Lord Herbert's De Religione Gentilium. See Introduction.

1. That he that cannot forgive others breaks the bridge over which he must pass himself, for every man hath need to be forgiven.

2. That when a man wants or comes short of an entire and accomplished virtue, our defects may be supplied this way, since the forgiving of evil deeds in others amounteth to no less than virtue in us; that therefore it may be not unaptly called the paying our debts with another man's money.

3. That it is the most necessary and proper work of every man; for, though when I do not a just thing, or a charitable, or a wise, another man may do it for me, yet no man can forgive my enemy but myself. And these have been the chief motives for which I have been ever inclined to forgiveness; whereof, though I have rarely found other effect than that my servants, tenants, and neighbours have thereupon more frequently offended me, yet at least I have had within me an inward peace and comfort thereby; since I can truly say, nothing ever gave my mind more ease than when I had forgiven my enemies, which freed me from many cares and perturbations, which otherwise would have molested me.

And this likewise brings in another rule concerning the use of virtues, which is, that you are not to use justice where mercy is most proper; as, on the other side, a foolish pity is not to be preferred before that which is just and necessary for good example. So likewise liberality is not to be used where parsimony or frugality is more requisite; as, on the other side, it will be but a sordid thing in a gentleman to spare where expending of money would acquire unto him advantage, credit, or honour: and this rule in general ought to be practised, that the virtue requisite to the occasion is ever to be produced, as the most opportune and necessary. That, therefore, wisdom is the soul of all virtues, giving as unto her members life and motion, and so necessary in every action, that whosoever by the benefit of true wisdom makes use of the right virtue, on all emergent occasions, I dare say would never be constrained to have recourse to vice, whereby it appears that every virtue is not to be employed indifferently, but that only which is proper for the business in question ; among which yet temperance seems so universally requisite, that some part of it at least will be a necessary ingredient in all human actions, since there may be an excess even in religious worship, at those times when other duties are required at our hands. After all, moral virtues are learned and directed to the service and glory of God, as the principal end and use of them.

¹ Horace Walpole (Lord Orford) remarks on this passage: 'This is a very unchristian reason for pardoning our enemies, and can by no means be properly called forgiveness. Is it forgiveness to remit a punishment on the hope of its being doubled?' Bacon, from an equally utilitarian point of view, puts the case better. 'Certainly in taking revenge a man is but even with his enemy; but in passing it over he is superior; for it is a prince's part to pardon. And Solomon, I am sure, saith, It is the glory of a man to pass by an offence. That which is past is gone and irrevocable: and wise men have enough to do with things present and to come. A man does wrong in order to profit himself. Therefore why should I be angry with a man for loving himself better than me?' (Essay on Revenge).

It would be fit that some time be spent in learning rhetoric or oratory, to the intent that upon all occasions you may express yourself with eloquence and grace ; for, as it is not enough for a man to have a diamond unless it is polished and cut out into its due angles, and a foil be set underneath, whereby it may the better transmit and vibrate its native lustre and rays ; so it will not be sufficient for a man to have a great understanding in all matters, unless the said understanding be not only polished and clear, but under-set and holpen a little with those figures, tropes, and colours which rhetoric affords, where there is use of persuasion. I can by no means yet commend an affected eloquence, there being nothing so pedantical, or indeed that would give more suspicion that the truth is not intended, than to use overmuch the common forms prescribed in schools. It is well said by them, that there are two parts of eloquence necessary and commendable ; one is, to speak hard things plainly, so that when a knotty or intricate business, having no method or coherence in its parts, shall be presented, it will be a singular part of oratory to take those parts asunder, set them together aptly, and so exhibit them to the understanding. And this part of rhetoric I much commend to everybody ; there being no true use of speech, but to make things clear, perspicuous, and manifest, which otherwise would be perplexed, doubtful, and obscure.

The other part of oratory is to speak common things ingeniously or wittily ; there being no little vigour and force added to words, when they are delivered in a neat and fine way, and somewhat out of the ordinary road, common and dull language relishing more of the clown than the gentleman. But herein also affectation must be avoided ; it being better for a man by a native and clear eloquence to express himself, than by those words which may smell either of the lamp or inkhorn ; so that, in general, one may observe, that men who fortify and uphold their speeches with strong and evident reasons, have ever operated more on the minds of the auditors, than those who have made rhetorical excursions.

It will be better for a man who is doubtful of his pay to take an ordinary silver piece with its due stamp upon it, than an extraordinary gilded piece which may perchance contain a baser metal under it ; and prefer a well-favoured wholesome woman, though with a tawny complexion, before a besmeared and painted face.

It is a general note, that a man's wit is best showed in his answer, and his valour in his defence ; that therefore as men learn in fencing how to ward all blows and thrusts, which are or can be made against him [? them], so it will be fitting to debate and resolve beforehand what you are to say or do upon any affront given you, lest otherwise you should be surprised. Aristotle hath written a book of rhetoric, a work in my opinion not inferior to his best pieces, whom therefore with Cicero de Oratore, as also Quintilian, you may read from your instruction how to speak ; neither of which two yet I can think so exact in their orations, but that a middle style will be of more efficacy, Cicero in my opinion being too long and tedious, and Quintilian too short and concise.

Having thus by moral philosophy enabled yourself to all that wisdom and goodness which is requisite to direct you in all your particular actions, it will be fit now to think how you are to behave yourself as a public person, or member of the commonwealth and kingdom wherein you live ; as also to look into those principles and grounds upon which government is framed, it being manifest in nature that the wise doth easily govern the foolish, and the strong master the weak, so that he that could attain most wisdom and power, would quickly rule his fellows ; for proof whereof, one may observe that a king is sick during that time the physicians govern him, and in day of battle an expert general appoints the king a place in which he shall stand ; which was anciently the office of the constables de France. In law also the judge is in a sort superior to his king as long as he judgeth betwixt him and his people. In divinity also, he, to whom the king commits the charge of his conscience, is his superior in that particular. All which instances may sufficiently prove, that in many cases the wiser governs or commands one less wise than himself, unless a wilful obstinacy be interposed; in which case recourse must be had to strength, where obedience is necessary.

The exercises I chiefly used, and most recommend to my posterity, were riding the great horse¹ and fencing, in which arts I had excellent masters, English, French, and Italian². As for dancing, I could never find leisure enough to learn it, as employing my mind always in acquiring of some art or science more useful; howbeit, I shall wish these three exercises learned in this order³.

That dancing may be learnt first, as that which doth fashion the body, gives one a good presence in and address to all companies, since it disposeth the limbs to a kind of souplesse (as the Frenchmen call it) and agility, insomuch as they seem to have the use of their legs, arms, and bodices, more than any others, who, standing stiff and stark in their postures, seem as if they were taken in their joints, or had not the perfect use of their members⁴. I speak not this yet as if I would have a youth never ¹ This very well-known phrase was first fully explained by Richard Bereuger in his History and Art of Horsemanship (London, 1771), i. 169, 170. Great horses, he says, [called also Destriers (Lat.), Destriere (Ital.), and Destrier (Fr.), from dextra, as being carefully handled, dressed, or managed], are opposed to Palfreys, Coursers, and Nags, and are exclusively used in war and for the exercises of the Tournament. They are usually of prodigious weight, because their riders are clothed in complete armour. Their size made it necessary for soldiers to learn the art of managing them after certain fixed rules, and hence came the expression to 'ride the great horse'. The passage is quoted fully by Mr. T. W. Jackson in the Oxford Historical Society's Collectanea, i. 273. Mr. Jackson quotes from the Gentleman's Dictionary (1705), that 'a horse for war should be 16 or 18 hands high'. Reference should be made to Markham's Country Contentments (1615), pp. 35-86, and Cavalry (1617), to Sir William Hope's Compleat Horseman (1717), and to the Duke of Newcastle's splendid folios—the Methode Nouvelle de Dresser des Chevaux (Antw., 1658), and A New Method . . . to Dress Horses (Lond., 1667)—for fuller information as to seventeenth-century horsemanship.

² French masters were most usually employed. Prince Henry was given by Sully a French riding and a French fencing master. References to such foreign teachers are common in the dramatists: see an interesting note in W. B. Ryer's England as Seen by Foreigners, p. 253.

³ Sir R. Southwell thus describes the accomplishments of Lord Ossory, son of the first Duke of Ormonde (about 1650), a perfect specimen of the educated youth of the seventeenth century: 'He rides the great horse very well; is a good tennis-player, fencer, and dancer. He understands music, and plays on the guitar and lute; speaks French elegantly; reads Italian fluently, is a good historian, and so well versed in romances that if a gallery be full of pictures or hangings he will tell the stories of all of them that are described'. Cf. Thomas Lockin's letter to Adam Newton, Prince Henry's tutor, respecting the completion of a young gentleman's education at Paris in 1610. Horse-riding, fencing, and dancing were to be practised at stated hours daily. Ellis's Orig. Letters, second series, iii. 220, 221.

⁴ Cf. Locke On Education, 1693, p. 307. 'Dancing . . . gives graceful motions all stand still in company, but only, that when he hath occasion to stir, his motions may be comely and graceful, that he may learn to know how to come in and go out of a room where company is, how to make courtesies handsomely, according to the several degrees of persons he shall encounter, how to put off and hold his hat ; all which, and many other things which become men, are taught by the more accurate dancing-masters in France.

The next exercise a young man should learn (but not before he is eleven or twelve years of age) is fencing¹ ; for the attaining of which the Frenchman's rule is excellent, bon pied bon œil, by which to teach men how far they may stretch out their feet when they would make a thrust against their enemy, lest either should overstride themselves, or, not striding far enough, fail to bring the point of their weapon home. The second part of his direction adviseth the scholar to keep a fixed eye upon the point of his enemy's sword, to the intent he may both put by or ward the blows and thrusts made against him, and together direct the point of his sword upon some part of his enemy that lieth naked and open to him.

The good fencing-masters, in France especially, when they present a foil or fleuret² to their scholars, tell him it hath two parts, one of which he calleth the fort or strong, and the other the foyble³ or weak. With the fort or strong, which extends from the part of the hilt next the sword about a third part of the whole length, thereof he teacheth his scholars to defend themselves, and put by and ward the thrusts and blows of his enemy, and with the other two-third parts to strike or thrust as he shall see occasion ; which rule also teacheth how to strike or thrust high or low as his enemy doth, and briefly to take his measure and time upon his adversary's motions, whereby he may both defend himself or offend his adversary, of which I have had much experiment and use both in the fleuret, or foil, as also when I fought in good earnest with many persons at one and the same time, as will appear in the sequel the life, and above all things manliness and a becoming confidence to young children. Locke warns the pupil, however, against 'apish, affected postures, and only values the accomplishment' as it tends to perfect graceful carriage.

¹ Of fencing Locke says 'it seems to me a good exercise for the health, but dangerous to the life, the confidence of their skill being apt to encourage in quarrels those that think they have learned to use their swords'—which was certainly the case with Lord Herbert.

² Mod. Fr.=foil.

³ i.e., Mod. Fr., faible.

of my life. And, indeed, I think I shall not speak vaingloriously of myself, if I say, that no man understood the use of his weapon better than I did, or hath more dexterously prevailed himself thereof on all occasions ; since I found no man could be hurt but through some error in fencing.

I spent much time also in learning to ride the great horse, that creature being made above all others for the service of man, as giving his rider all the advantages of which he is capable, while sometimes he gives him strength, sometimes agility or motion for the overcoming of his enemy, insomuch, that a good rider on a good horse, is as much above himself and others, as this world can make him ¹. The rule for graceful riding is, that a man hold his eyes always betwixt the two ears, and his rod ² over the left ear of his horse ; which he is to use for turning him every way, helping himself with his left foot and rod upon the left part of his neck, to make his horse turn on the right hand, and with the right foot and help of his rod also (if needs be), to turn him on the left hand ; but this is to be used rather when one would make a horse understand these motions, than when he is a ready horse, the foot and stirrup alone applied to either shoulder being sufficient, with the help of the reins, to make him turn any way. That a rider thus may have the use of his sword, or when it is requisite only to make a horse go sideways, it will be enough to keep the reins equal in his hand, and with the flat of his leg and foot together, and a touch upon the shoulder of the horse with the stirrup to make him go sideward either way, without either advancing forward, or returning backwards.

The most useful aer ³, as the Frenchmen term it, is terrible ⁴ the courbettes, cabrioles, or un pas et un sault ⁵, being fitter for horses of parade and triumph than for soldiers ; yet I cannot deny but a demivolte ⁶ with courbettes, so that they

¹ Cf. Lord Herbert's remarks in the Dialogue, p. 225 : 'In which number [i.e. of the animals most useful to man] the horse must have the precedence, being the animal which exalts man so much, that he takes strength, motion, and even comeliness from a good posture on horseback'.

² i.e. whip.

³ Aer or air, is a word applied generally to the artificial movements of a managed horse. Dr Murray quotes in his Dictionary from Brooke, Eng. Episc., I, ii, 5 (1641) : 'Horses which are designed to a lofty Ayre and generous manege must be of a noble race'.

⁴ i.e. terre-à-terre, a forward jump.

⁵ Technical terms for various leaps, fully described and illustrated by Pluvineau and Labrousse.

be not too high, may be useful in a fight or mêlée; for, as Labroue hath it in his book of horsemanship¹, Monsieur de Montmorency having a horse that was excellent in performing the demivolte, did with his sword strike down two adversaries from their horses in a tourney, where divers of the prime gallants of France did meet; for taking his time when the horse was in the height of his courbette, and discharging a blow, then his sword fell with such weight and force upon the two cavaliers one after another, that he struck them from their horses to the ground².

The manner of fighting a duel on horseback I was taught thus. We had each of us a reasonable stiff riding-rod in our hands, about the length of a sword, and so rid one against the other; he, as the more expert, sat still to pass me and then to get behind me, and after to turn with his right hand upon my left side with his rod, that so he might hit me with the point thereof in the body; and he that can do this handsomely, is sure to overcome his adversary, it being impossible to bring his sword about enough to defend himself or offend the assailant: and to get this advantage, which they call in French, gagner la crouppe, nothing is so useful as to make a horse to go only sideward until his adversary be past him, since he will by this means avoid his adversary's blow or thrust, and on a sudden get on the left hand of his adversary in the manner I formerly related; but of this art let Labroue and Pluvinel³ be read, who are excellent masters in that art, of whom I must confess I learned much; though, to speak ingenuously, my breaking two or three colts, and teaching them afterwards those aers of which they were most capable, taught me both

¹ The first edition is entitled Preceptes principaux que les bons Cavaliers doivent exactement observer en leurs Ecoles. . . . Composés par Sieur de la Broue. La Rochelle, 1593. The second and more elaborate edition bears the title: La Cavalerie François: composé par Salomon de la Broue, Escuyer de escuierie du Roy et de Monseigneur Le Duc d'Espernon. Paris, 1602. A copy presented by the author to James I is in the British Museum. Lord Herbert's remarks on equestrian evolutions are summarized extracts from Labroue's book.

² This story, told by Labroue in his eighteenth chapter of both editions—(Passade a deny air)—relates to Lord Herbert's friend, Henri Duc de Montmorency, when he was known as 'Monsieur le Mareschal du Danpulle, maintenant Connestable de France'. Montmorency is frequently mentioned by Labroue as the best horseman he had seen, and the second book of the second edition is dedicated to him. He is stated to have twice performed the feat here mentioned, once at Bayonne, and again in presence of the Court in the Louvre Garden at Paris.

³ Antoine de Pluvinel, Ecuyer to Louis XIII, author of Instruction du Roi en l'exercice de monter à cheval (Paris, 1619), with plates by Crispin Pass, exhibiting the whole system what I was to do, and made me see mine errors, more than all their precepts.

To make a horse fit for the wars, and embolden him against all terrors, these inventions are useful : to beat a drum out of the stable first, and then give him his provender : then beat a drum in the stable by degrees, and then give him his provender upon the drum. When he is acquainted herewith sufficiently, you must shoot off a pistol out of the stable, before he hath his provender ; then you may shoot off a pistol in the stable, and so by degrees bring it as near to him as you can till he be acquainted with the pistol, likewise remembering still after every shot to give him more provender. You must also cause his groom to put on bright armour, and so to rub his heels and dress him. You must also present a sword before him in the said armour, and when you have done, give him still some more provender. Lastly, his rider must bring his horse forth into the open field, where a bright armour must be fastened upon a stake, and set forth in the likeness of an armed man as much as possible ; which being done, the rider must put his horse on until he make him not only approach the said image, but thrown it down ; which being done, you must be sure to give him some provender, that he may be encouraged to do the like against an adversary in battle. It will be good also that two men do hold up a cloak betwixt them in the field, and then the rider to put the horse to it until he leap over, which cloak also they may raise as they see occasion, when the horse is able to leap so high. You shall do well also to use your horse to swimming ; which you may do, either by trailing him after you at the tail of a boat, in a good river, holding him by the head at the length of the bridle, or by putting a good swimmer in a linen waistcoat and breeches upon him ¹.

It will be fit for a gentleman also to learn to swim, unless he be given cramps and convulsions ² ; howbeit, I must confess, in my own particular, that I cannot swim ; for, as I was once in danger of drowning, by learning to swim, my mother, upon her blessing, charged me never to learn swimming, telling me further, that she had heard of more drowned than saved by

¹ Locke, in opposition to Lord Herbert, warns his pupil against making 'a business of' learning to ride the great horse, and urges that 'a firm and graceful seat on horse-back' is all that is desirable.

² Cf. Everard Digby's De Arte Natandi, 1587, the first book on the subject produced in England. The plates are very curious.

it; which reason, though it did not prevail with me, yet her commandment did. It will be good also for a gentleman to learn to leap, wrestle, and vault on horseback: they being all of them qualities of great use. I do much approve likewise of shooting in the long-bow, as being both an healthful exercise and useful for the wars, notwithstanding all that our firemen speak against it; for, bring an hundred archers against so many musqueteers, I say if the archer comes within his distance, he will not only make two shoots, but two hits for one:

The exercises I do not approve of are riding of running horses², there being much cheating in that kind: neither do I see why a brave man should delight in a creature whose chief use is to help him to run away. I do not much like of hunting horses, that exercise taking up more time than can be spared from a man studious to get knowledge; it is enough, therefore, to know the sport, if there be any in it, without making it an ordinary practice; and, indeed, of the two, hawking is the better, because less time is spent in it³. And upon these terms also I can allow a little bowling; so that the company be choice and good.

The exercises I wholly condemn, are dicing and carding, especially if you play for any great sum of money, or spend any time in them; or use to come to meetings in dicing-houses where cheaters meet and cozen young gentlemen of all their money. I could say much more concerning all these points of education, and particularly concerning the discreet civility which is to be observed in communication either with friends or strangers, but this work would grow too big: and that many precepts conducing thereunto may be had in *Guazzo de la Civile Conversation*⁴, and *Galeus de Moribus*⁵.

¹ Lord Herbert makes similar remarks in his Henry VIII, when speaking of the statutes for the encouragement of archery (1534 and 1541). He condemns the caliver as more costly than the bow, and more difficult to use. Sir John Smythe, in his Discourses of Weapons, 1590, writes emphatically in the same sense, calling the long-bow our [i.e. Englishmen's] peculiar and singular weapon' (p. 27).

² i.e. racing. Newmarket was acquiring its first fame in the fashionable world while Lord Herbert was a young man.

³ James I, like many other writers on education, takes just the opposite view in his Basiliikon Doron, lib. iii, p. 122. He says that hawking is to be praised sparingly, because it is an extreme stirrer-up of passions, and neither resembles war nor makes a man hardy as hunting does.

⁴ La Civil Conversatione del Signor Siefano Guazzo (Venice, 1575). An English translation was published at London in 1586, in four books, the first three being the work of George Pettie, and the fourth of Bartholomew Young.

⁵ This is an Italian book usually known as Il Galathea; translations exist in Latin and almost all modern languages. The author was Giovanni della Casa (1503-56), Archbishop of Benevento from 1544 till his death. The work was written about 1550,

It would also deserve a particular lecture or recherche, how one ought to behave himself with children, servants, tenants, and neighbours; and I am confident, that precepts in this point will be found more useful to young gentlemen, than all the subtleties of schools. I confess I have collected many things to this purpose, which I forbear to set down here; because, if God grant me life and health, I intend to make a little treatise concerning these points¹. I shall return now to the narration of mine own history.

When I had attained the age betwixt eighteen or nineteen years, my mother, together with myself and wife, removed up to London, where we took house, and kept a greater family than became either my mother's widow's estate, or such young beginners as we were; especially, since six brothers and three sisters were to be provided for, my father having either made no will, or such an imperfect one, that it was not proved. My mother, although she had all my father's leases and goods, which were of great value, yet she desired me to undertake that burden of providing for my brothers and sisters; which, to gratify my mother, as well as those so near me, I was voluntarily content to provide thus far, as to give my six brothers thirty pounds apiece yearly, during their lives, and my three sisters one thousand pounds apiece, which portions married them to those I have above mentioned. My younger sister, indeed², might have been married to a far greater fortune, had not the overthwartness of some neighbours interrupted it.

About the year of our Lord 1600 I came to London, shortly after which the attempt of the Earl of Essex, related in our history, followed³; which I had rather were seen in the writers of that argument than here. Not long after this, curiosity, rather than ambition, brought me to court; and as it was the manner of those times for all men to kneel down and first published at Milan in 1559. It was long a standard educational work in Italy. Alfieri the poet complains bitterly in his autobiography of the pain its perusal caused him in his youth. Extracts from it are given by Mr. W. M. Rossetti in his Essay on Italian Courtesy Books appended to the English Tracts on Courtesy, edited by Dr. F. J. Furnivall for the Early English Text Society (1879). Della Casa wrote another book on a similar subject, entitled Trattato degli Uffici Comuni tra gli Amici Superiori e Inferiori, which probably suggested to Herbert the next paragraph.

¹ See the account given in the introduction of A Dialogue between a Tutor and a Pupil, attributed rightly (as I judge) to Lord Herbert, and first published in 1768. A manuscript copy is in the Bodleian Library, Oxford (MS. Rawlinson, c. 95).

² The wife of Sir John Brown of Lincolnshire (p. 15, supra).

³ Essex's fruitless rising in London took place on Sunday, 7th February 1600-1. The Earl was executed 28th February.

before the great Queen Elizabeth, who then reigned, I was likewise upon my knees in the presence-chamber, when she passed by to the Chapel at Whitehall. As soon as she saw me, she stopped, and swearing, her usual oath¹, demanded, 'Who is this?' Everybody there present looked upon me, but no man knew me, until Sir James Croft, a pensioner², finding the Queen stayed, returned back and told who I was, and that I had married Sir William Herbert of St. Julian's daughter. The Queen hereupon looked attentively upon me, and swearing her ordinary oath, said it is pity he was married so young, and thereupon gave her hand to kiss twice, both times gently clapping me on the cheek. I remember little more of myself, but that, from that time until King James's coming to the crown, I had a son which died shortly afterwards, and that I attended my studies seriously; the more I learnt out of my books, adding still a desire to know more.

King James being now acknowledged King, and coming towards London, I thought fit to meet his Majesty at Burleigh, near Stamford³. Shortly after I was made Knight of the Bath, with the usual ceremonies belonging to that ancient order⁴. I could tell how much my person was commended by the lords and ladies that came to see the solemnity then used; but I shall flatter myself too much if I believed it.

I must not forget yet the ancient custom, being that some principal person was to put on the right spur of those the King had appointed to receive that dignity⁵. The Earl of Shrews-

¹ Naunton gives God's Death as the Queen's 'wonted oath.' Fragmenta Regalia (1641), ed. Arber, p. 17.

² Third son of Sir James Croft, of Croft Castle, Herefordshire, the well-known Controller of Queen Elizabeth's household; was knighted 23d July 1603; took a prominent part in Queen Anne's funeral in 1619, was alive in 1626 (Retrospective Review, second ser. i, 491). The pensioners were young gentlemen of rank and fortune, selected by Queen Elizabeth for her bodyguard on account of their handsome faces and figures (cf. Midsummer Night's Dream, ii, 1, 10, and Merry Wives of Windsor, ii, 2, 79, and Osborne's Elizabeth in Court of James I, i, 55).

³ James I stayed at Burleigh or Burghley House, the property of Thomas Cecil, the eldest son and successor of the first Lord Burghley, from Saturday the 23d till Wednesday 27th April 1603.

⁴ 'Sunday the 24th [July 1603], was performed the solemnity of Knights of the Bath, riding honorably from Saint James to the Courte, and made shew with their Squires and Pages about the tilt-yard, and after went into the Parke of Saint James and there lighted all from there horses, and went uppe to the King's Majestie's presence in the gallery, where they received the Order of Knighthood of the Bathe'.—Howes' Chronicle, p. 827. Some sixty persons received the honour besides Lord Herbert.

⁵ An elaborate account of the ceremonial observed at the creation of Knights of the Bath is printed at the end of The Order . . . of the creation . . . of Prince Henry, Prince of Wales . . . Lond. 1610; and is reprinted both in Somers' Tracts and in Nicholls' Progresses of James I, ii, 316-17.

bury, seeing my esquire there with my spur in his hand, voluntarily came to me, and said, 'Cousin, I believe you will be a good knight, and therefore I will put on your spur'; whereupon, after my most humble thanks for so great a favour, I held up my leg against the wall, and he put on my spur.

There is another custom likewise, that the knights the first day wear the gown of some religious order, and the night following to be bathed; after which they take an oath never to sit in place where injustice should be done, but they shall right it to the uttermost of their power; and particularly ladies and gentlewomen that shall be wronged in their honour, if they demand assistance, and many other points, not unlike the romances of knight errantry¹.

The second day to wear robes of crimson taffety (in which habit I am painted in my study),² and so to ride from St. James's to Whitehall, with our esquires before us; and the third day to wear a gown of purple satin, upon the left sleeve whereof is fastened certain strings weaved of white silk and gold tied in a knot, and tassels to it of the same, which all the knights are obliged to wear until they have done something famous in arms, or until some lady of honour take it off, and fasten it on her sleeve, saying, I will answer he shall prove a good knight. I had not long worn this string, but a principal lady of the court, and, certainly, in most men's opinion, the handsomest³, took mine off, and said she would pledge her honour for mine. I do not name this lady, because some passages happened afterwards which oblige me to silence; though nothing could be justly said to her prejudice or wrong.

Shortly after this I intended to go with Charles, Earl of

¹ This oath, which Lord Herbert kept very quixotically, was (according to Howes Chronicle) administered in these words: 'Right deere brother . . . you shall honour God above all things; you shall be stedfast in the faith of Christ, and the same maintain, and defend to your power; you shall love your Sovereigne above all earthly creatures, and for your Sovereigne's right and dignity live and dye; you shall defend widowes, maydens, and orphans in their right; you shall suffer no extortion as farre forth as you maye, nor sit in any place where any wrongful judgement shall be given to your knowledge'.

² This picture, by an unknown artist, is now at Powis Castle in the possession of the Earl of Powis.

³ It is impossible to determine with certainty who this lady was. Reference is made to her again on p. 70. Selden reports a liaison between Herbert and Lady Kent, probably Mary the daughter of Sir George Cotton, and wife of Henry, sixth Earl of Kent, about which Herbert is discreetly silent, but the lady may be covertly alluded to here. 'Lady Kent', says Selden, 'articled with Sir Edward Herbert that he should come to her when she sent for him and stay with her as long as she would have him, to which he set his hand; then he articled with her, that he should go away when he pleas'd, and stay away as long as he pleas'd, to which she set her hand'.—Table-Talk, ed. Arber, p. 47.

Nottingham, the Lord Admiral, who went to Spain ¹ to take the King's oath for confirmation of the articles of peace betwixt the two crowns. Howbeit, by the industry of some near me, who desired to stay me at home, I was hindered; and, instead of going that voyage, was made Sheriff of Montgomeryshire ², concerning which I will say no more, but that I bestowed the place of under-sheriff, as also other places in my gifts, freely, without either taking gift or reward; which custom also I have observed throughout the whole course of my life; insomuch that when I was ambassador in France, and might have had great presents, which former ambassadors accepted, for doing lawful courtesies to merchants and others, yet no gratuity, upon what terms soever, could ever be fastened upon me.

This public duty did not hinder me yet to follow my beloved studies in a country life for the most part; although sometimes also I resorted to court, without yet that I had any ambition there, and much less was tainted with those corrupt delights incident to the times ³. For, living with my wife in all conjugal loyalty for the space of about ten years after my marriage, I wholly declined the allurements and temptations whatsoever, which might incline me to violate my marriage bed.

About the year 1608, my two daughters, called Beatrice ⁴, and Florence ⁵ who lived not yet long after, and one son Richard being born, and come to so much maturity, that, although in their mere childhood, they gave no little hopes of themselves for the future time, I called them all before my wife, demanding, how she liked them, to which she answering

¹ In Feb. 1604-5 (Winwood's Memorials, ii, 50).

² In 1605. His deputy or under-sheriff was Edward Whittingham, son of William Whittingham, bailiff of Montgomery 1590-1, and chief steward of Llanowthen to Lord Herbert's father in 1595-6. Lloyd's Sheriffs of Montgomeryshire in Powysland Coll., v, 479-81.

³ From 1605 onwards Lord Herbert's name appears on the roll of Montgomeryshire magistrates, but there is no evidence to show that he spent much time in the country. Powysland Collections, v, 479-81. It is singular that Lord Herbert omits to mention that on 9th February 1606-7 James I granted the Castle of Montgomery, which had been in the possession of Lord Herbert's family since his grandfather's time, to Philip Herbert, a kinsman through another line, who was created Earl of Montgomery 4th May 1605. From the date of this grant till 12th July 1613 the Castle remained in the hands of the Earl of Montgomery, but at the later date he restored it to Lord Herbert in consideration of the payment of £500. The Castle passed out of his possession again in 1616, but for only a short time. Documents establishing these facts are now at Powis Castle, and are described in the Powysland Collections, x, pp. 168 et seq.

⁴ Born 13th August 1604, and baptized at Montgomery, 28th August. Beatrice survived her father.

⁵ Born 27th September 1605, and baptized in Montgomery Church 14th October following.

' well ' ; I demanded then, whether she was willing to do so much for thomas I would ? whereupon, she replying, demanded what I meant by that. I told her, that, for my part, I was but young for a man, and she not old for a woman ; that our lives were in the hands of God ; that, if He pleased to call either of us away, that party which remained might marry again, and have children by some other, to which our estates might be disposed ; for preventing whereof, I thought fit to motion to her, that if she would assure ¹ upon the son any quantity of lands from three hundred pounds a year to one thousand, I would do the like. But my wife not approving hercof, answered, in these express words, that she would not draw the cradle upon her head ; whereupon, I desiring her to advise better upon the business, and to take some few days' respite for that purpose, she seemed to depart from me not very well contented. About a week or ten days afterwards, I demanded again what she thought concerning the motion I made ; to which yet she said no more, but that she thought she had already answered me sufficiently to the point. I told her then, that I should make another motion to her ; which was, that in regard I was too young to go beyond sea before I married her, she now would give me leave for a while to see foreign countries ; howbeit, if she would assure her lands as I would mine, in the manner above-mentioned, I would never depart from her. She answered, that I knew her mind before concerning that point, yet that she should be sorry I went beyond sea ; nevertheless, if I would needs go, she could not help it. This, whether a license taken or given, served my turn to prepare without delay for a journey beyond sea, that so I might satisfy that curiosity I long since had to see foreign countries. So that I might leave my wife so little discontented as I could, I left her not only posterity to renew the family of the Herberts of St. Julian's according to her father's desire to inherit his lands, but the rents of all the lands she brought with her ; reserving mine own, partly to pay my brothers' and sisters' portions, and defraying my charges abroad. Upon which terms, though I was sorry to leave my wife, as having lived most honestly with her all this time, I thought it no such unjust ambition, to attain the knowledge of foreign countries ; especially, since I had in great part already attained the languages, and that I intended not to spend any long time out of my country.

¹ i.e. convey by deed. Cf. Leviticus xxvii, 19 : ' He shall add the fifth part of the money . . . and it shall be assured to him '.

Before I departed yet, I left her with child of a son, christened afterwards by the name of Edward; and now coming to court, I obtained a license to go beyond sea, taking with me for my companion Mr. Aurelian Townsend¹, a gentleman that spoke the languages of French, Italian, and Spanish, in great perfection, and a man to wait in my chamber, who spoke French, two lacqueys, and three horses. Coming thus to Dover, and passing the seas thence to Calais, I journeyed without any memorable adventure, until I came to Faubourg St. Germain in Paris, where Sir George Carew, then ambassador for the King², lived; I was kindly received by him, and often invited to his table³. Next to his house dwelt the Duke of Ventadour, who had married a daughter of Monsieur de Montmorency, Grand Constable de France. Many visits being exchanged between that Duchess and the lady of our ambassador, it pleased the Duchess to invite me to her father's house, at the castle of Merlou, being about twenty-four miles from Paris⁴; and here I found much welcome from that brave old General, who being informed of my name, said he knew well of what family I was⁵; telling the first notice he had of the ¹ He was the author of two court masques, both published in 1632. The one is entitled Albion's Triumph, and was 'personated at Court . . . the Sunday after Twelfth Night 1631'; the other, named Tempe Restord, was performed on Shrove Tuesday following. Townsend was a patron of the poets, and is introduced by Suckling into the Session of the Poets.

² From 1605 to 1609 (see Brit. Mus. MS. Addit. 20,765, p. 143). He afterwards became Master of the Court of Wards, and died in 1612. He must be distinguished from the Irish administrator of the same name.

³ In a satyra called Travellers from Paris, addressed to Ben Jonson, dated September 1608, Lord Herbert writes thus of his fellow-countrymen in Paris:

. . . all they learn is
Toys and the languages, but to attain this,
You must conceive they're cosen'd, mocked, and come
To Fourbours St. Germans, there take a Room Lightly about th' Ambassadors, and where Having no Church, they come Sundays to hear, etc.

⁴ Near Clermont (Oise). The village whence the castle takes its name is now known as Mello. The old forms Mellou and Meslou are known, but not that of Merlou. M. de Rémusat states that a magnificent castle and park are still in existence there (Lord Herbert, Sa Vie et ses Œuvres, p. 30). Several of Lord Herbert's poems are dated from Merlou, and a sonnet 'made upon the groves near Merlou Castle' gives vigorous expression to the rare delight with which the beauty of the place inspired him.

⁵ Henri de Montmorency was second son of the Constable Anne (who, after taking part in the battle of St. Quentin, was killed at St. Denis in 1567), and brother of François, Duc de Montmorency, who died in 1579. Henri, born in 1534, was known in early life as the Comte de Damville, was present at St. Quentin in 1557, and, like his father

Herberts was at the siege of St Quentin, where my grandfather, with a command of foot under William Earl of Pembroke, was¹. Passing two or three days here, it happened one evening, that a daughter of the Duchess, of about ten or eleven years of age, going one evening from the castle to walk in the meadows, myself, with divers French gentlemen, attended her and some gentlewomen that were with her. This young lady wearing a knot of ribbon on her head, a French chevalier took it suddenly, and fastened it to his hatband. The young lady, offended herewith, demands her ribbon, but he refusing to restore it, the young lady, addressing herself to me, said, 'Monsieur, I pray get my ribbon from that gentleman'. Hereupon, going towards him, I courteously, with my hat in my hand, desired him to do me the honour, that I may deliver the lady her ribbon or bouquet again; but he roughly answering me, 'Do you think I will give it you, when I have refused it to her?' I replied, 'Nay then, sir, I will make you restore it by force'; whereupon also, putting on my hat and reaching at his, he to save himself ran away, and, after a long course in the meadow, finding that I had almost overtaken him, he turned short, and running to the young lady, was about to put the ribbon on her hand, when I, seizing upon his arm, said to the young lady, 'It was I that gave it'. 'Pardon me', quoth she, 'it is he that gives it me'. I said then, 'Madam, I will not contradict you; but if he dare say that I did not constrain him to give it, I will fight with him'. The French gentleman answered nothing thereunto for the present, and so conducted the young lady again to the castle. The next day I desired Mr. Aurelian Townsend to tell the French cavalier, that either he must confess that I constrained him to restore the ribbon, or fight with me; but the gentleman seeing him unwilling to accept of this challenge, went out from the place, whereupon, I following him, some of the gentlemen that belonged to the Constable taking notice hereof, acquainted him therewith, who sending for the French cavalier, checked him well for his sauciness, in taking the ribbon away from his was taken prisoner by the Spaniards and the English. He fought at the battles of Dreux and St. Denis, but gained his chief fame as Governor of Languedoc from 1563 onwards. He ultimately became a supporter of Henri IV, was made by him Constable of France, and died 2d April 1614. (See Biographie Universelle, s. v. Montmorency). His second daughter, Marguerite, married Aune de Levis, Duc de Ventadour, to whom reference is made above.

¹ See p. 3, note 2, supra.

grandchild, and afterwards bid him depart his house ; and this was all that I ever heard of the gentleman, with whom I proceeded in that manner, because I thought myself obliged thereunto by the oath taken when I was made Knight of the Bath, as I formerly related upon this occasion ¹.

I must remember also, that three other times I engaged myself to challenge men to fight with me, who I conceived had injured ladies and gentlewomen ² ; one was in defence of my cousin, Sir Francis Newport's daughter, who was married to John Barker of Hamon ; for Walter, the younger brother and heir, to the said John Barker, had betrayed my cousin, who thought to use perchance some more liberty than became her with a servant in the house whom she favoured above the rest ; Walter Barker, as I was told by another, nourished the said familiarity, and afterwards discovered it to his brother ; which part of his being treacherous, as I conceived, I thought fit to send ³ him a challenge, which to this day he never answered ; and would have beaten him afterwards, but that I was hindered by my uncle Sir Francis Newport.

I had another occasion to challenge one Captain Vaughan, who I conceived offered some injury to my sister the Lady Jones of Abernaries. I sent him a challenge, which he accepted, the place between us being appointed beyond Greenwich, with seconds on both sides. Hereupon, I coming to the King's Head in Greenwich, with intention the next morning to be in the place, I found the house beset with at least an hundred persons, partly sent by the Lords of the Privy Council, who gave orders to apprehend me. I hearing thereof, desired my servant to bring my horses as far as he could from my lodging, but yet within sight of me ; which being done, and all this company coming to lay hold on me, I and my second, who was my cousin, James Price of Hanachly, sallied out of the doors, with our swords drawn, and, in spite of that multitude, made our way to our horses, where my servant very honestly opposing himself against those who would have laid hands upon us, while we got up on horseback, was himself laid hold on by them, and evil treated ; which I perceiving, rid back again, and with my sword in my hand rescued him, and afterwards seeing him get on horseback, charged them to go anywhere rather than to follow me. Riding afterwards with my second to the place appointed, I found nobody there ; which, as I heard afterwards, happened, because the Lords of the Council, taking notice of this difference, apprehended him, and charged him in his Majesty's name not to fight with me ; since otherwise I believed he would not have failed.

¹ See p. 45.

² See Appendix IV, where I have collected some notes on the duelling of the period.

³ In all previous editions the sixty-four words between 'younger brother and heir' and 'sent him a challenge' were omitted, and blank spaces were commonly left for them. They are now supplied from a manuscript note made by Horace Walpole on his copy of the fourth edition of the book. He adds that the words were given him in 1789 by William Seward, who told him that it was copied from the original manuscript, which Walpole never saw. The manuscript copy which was lent Walpole by Lord Powis omitted the passage. Cf. Walpole's Letters ed. Cunningham, vol. iv, p. 275.

The third that I questioned in this kind was a Scotch gentleman, who, taking a ribbon in the like manner from Mrs. Middlemore, a maid of honour, as was done from the young lady above-mentioned, in a back room behind Queen Anne's lodgings in Greenwich, she likewise desired me to get her the said ribbon. I repaired, as formerly, to him in a courteous manner to demand it, but he refusing as the French cavalier did, I caught him by the neck, and had almost thrown him down, when company came in and parted us. I offered likewise to fight with this gentleman, and came to the place appointed by Hyde Park ; but this also was interrupted by order of the Lords of the Council, and I never heard more of him ¹.

These passages, though different in time, I have related here together ; both for the similitude of argument, and that it may appear how strictly I held myself to my oath of knighthood ; since, for the rest I can truly say, that, though I have lived in the armies and courts of the greatest princes in Christendom, yet I never had a quarrel with man for my own sake ; so that, although in mine own nature I was ever choleric and hasty, yet I never without occasion quarrelled with anybody, and as little did anybody attempt to give me offence, as having as clear a reputation for my courage as whosoever of my time. For my friends often I have hazarded myself ; but never yet drew my sword for my own sake singly, as hating ever the doing of injury, contenting myself only to resent them when they were offered me. After this digression I shall return to my history.

¹ Chamberlain describes this affair thus in a letter to Carleton, 23d January 1609-10 : ' There was a quarrel hatching at Greenwich 'twixt Sir Edward Herbert and one Boquhan [? Buchan], a Scot gentleman, usher to the Queen, about a ribbon or favour taken, as it were, by force from Mrs. Middlemore. But the matter was timely taken up, and compounded by the Council '.—Court and Times of James I, i, 103 ; Cal. State Papers 1603-10, p. 583.

That brave Constable in France testifying now more than formerly his regard of me, at his departure from Merlou to his fair house at Chantilly, five or six miles distant, said, he left that castle to be commanded by me, as also his forests and chases, which were well stored with wild boar and stag; and that I might hunt them when I pleased¹. He told me also, that if I would learn to ride the great horse, he had a stable there of some fifty, the best and choicest as was thought in France; and that his escuyer, called Monsieur de Disancourt, not inferior to Pluvinel or Labroue, should teach me². I did with great thankfulness accept his offer, as being very much addicted to the exercise of riding great horses; and, as for hunting in his forests, I told him I should use it sparingly, as being desirous to preserve his game. He commanded also his escuyer to keep a table for me, and his pages to attend me, the chief of whom was Monsieur de Mennon³, who proving to be one of the best horsemen in France, keeps now an academy in Paris; and here I shall recount a little passage betwixt him and his master, that the inclination of the French at that time may appear; there being scarce any man thought worth the looking on, that had not killed some other in duel.

Mennon (? Menou) desiring to marry a niece of Monsieur Disancourt, who it was thought should be his heir, was thus answered by him: 'Friend, it is not time yet to marry; I will tell you what you must do. If you will be a brave man, you must first kill in single combat two or three men, then afterwards marry and engender two or three children, so the world will neither have got nor lost by you ' ; of which strange counsel Disancourt was no otherwise the author than as he had been an example at least of the former part ; it being his fortune to have fought three or four brave duels in his time.

¹ In the account of the Constable written by a contemporary, Tallemant des Réaux, great stress is laid on his equestrian skill and on his passion for hunting: 'Il aimoit extrêmement les chevaux, et dès qu'un cheval étoit à lui, il ne échangeoit plus de maître, et, n'eût-il que trois jambes, on le nourrissoit dans une infirmerie qui étoit à Chantilly'. . . C'étoit un grand tyran pour la chasse. Cependant il disoit qu'il falloit permettre à un gentilhomme de poursuivre le gibier qu'il auroit fait lever sur sa propre terre et qu'en ce cas il laisseroit prendre un lièvre jusque dans sa salle'.—Historiettes, tom. i, p. 173, ed. 1861. As Grand Constable, Montmorency had the general direction of the equestrian education of the French army.

² Pluvinel had studied horsemanship under Pignatelli at Naples; was first Master of the Horse to Henri III, directed Henri IV's famous stables, became sub-governor to the Dauphin, and even French Ambassador to Holland. Salomon de la Broue was also Master of the Horse under Henri IV, but ultimately died in poverty. Both were authors of works on horsemanship, which Lord Herbert has already described.

³ Probably a misprint for M. René de Menou, the friend of Pluvinel and editor of his book Le Manège Royale. Pluvinel is generally believed to be the founder of riding schools or academies.

And now, as every morning I mounted the great horse, so in the afternoon I many times went a-hunting, the manner of which was this. The Duke of Montmorency having given orders to the tenants of the town of Merlou, and some villages adjoining, to attend me when I went a-hunting, they, upon my summons, usually repaired to those woods where I intended to find my game, with drums and muskets, to the number of sixty or eighty, and sometimes one hundred or more persons ; they entering the wood on that side with that noise, discharging their pieces and beating their said drums, we on the other side of the said wood having placed mastiffs and greyhounds to the number of twenty or thirty, which Monsieur de Montmorency kept near his castle, expected those beasts they should force out of the wood. If stags or wild boars came forth, we commonly spared them, pursuing only the wolves, which were there in great number, of which are found two sorts ; the mastiff wolf, thick and short, though he could not indeed run fast, yet would fight with our dogs ; the greyhound wolf, long and swift, who many times escaped our best dogs, although when he was overtaken, easily killed by us, without making much resistance. Of both these sorts I killed divers with my sword, while I stayed there.

One time also it was my fortune to kill a wild boar in this manner. The boar being roused from his den, fled before our dogs for a good space ; but finding them press him hard, turned his head against our dogs, and hurt three or four of them very dangerously : I came on horseback up to him, and with my sword thrust him twice or thrice without entering his skin, the blade being not so stiff as it should be. The boar hereupon turned upon me, and much endangered my horse ; which I perceiving, rid a little out of the way, and leaving my horse with my lacquey, returned with my sword against the boar, who by this time had hurt more dogs. And here happened a pretty kind of fight ; for, when I thrust at the boar sometimes with my sword, which in some places I made enter, the boar would run at me, whose tusks yet by stepping a little out of the way I avoided, but he then turning upon me, the dogs came in, and drew him off, so that he fell upon them, which I perceiving, ran at the boar with my sword again, which made him turn upon me, but then the dogs pulled him from me again, while so relieving one another by turns, we killed the boar. At this chase Monsieur Disancourt and Mennon (? Menou) were present, as also Mr. Townsend ; yet so as they did endeavour rather to withdraw me from, than assist me in the danger. Of which boar, some part being well seasoned and larded, I presented to my uncle Sir Francis Newport in Shropshire, and found most excellent meat.

Thus having passed a whole summer, partly in these exercises, and partly in visits of the Duke of Montmorency at his fair house at Chantilly ; which, for its extraordinary fairness and situation, I shall here describe.

A little river descending from some higher grounds in a country which was almost all his own, and falling at last upon a rock in the middle of a valley, which to keep its way forwards, it must on one or other side thereof have declined. Some of the ancestors of the Montmorencies, to ease the river of this labour, made divers channels through this rock to give it a free passage, dividing the rock by that means into little islands, upon which he built a great strong castle, joined together with bridges, and sumptuously furnished with hangings of silk and gold, rare pictures, and statues ; all which buildings, united as I formerly told, were encompassed about with water, which was paved with stone (those which were used in the building of the house were drawn from thence). One might see the huge carps, pike, and trouts, which were kept in several divisions, gliding along the waters very easily ; yet nothing in my opinion added so much to the glory of this castle as a forest adjoining close to it, and upon a level with the house. For being of a very large extent, and set thick both with tall trees and underwood, the whole forest, which was replenished with wild boar, stag, and roe-deer, was cut out into long walks every way ; so that, although the dogs might follow their chase through the thickets, the huntsmen might ride along the said walks, and meet or overtake their game in some one of them, they being cut with that art, that they led to all the parts in the said forest ; and here also I have hunted the wild boar divers times, both then and afterwards, when his son, the Duke of Montmorency, succeeded him in the possession of that incomparable place ¹.

And there I cannot but remember the direction the old Constable gave me to return to his castle out of this admirable labyrinth; telling me I should look upon what side the trees were roughest and hardest, which being found, I might be confident that part stood northward, which being observed, I might easily find the east, as being on the right hand; and so guide my way home.

How much this house, together with the forest, hath been valued by great princes, may appear by two little narratives I shall here insert. Charles V, the great Emperor, passing in the time of François I from Spain into the Low Countries, by the way of France, was entertained for some time in this house by a Duke of Montmorency, who was likewise Constable de France; after he had taken this palace into his consideration, with the forests adjoining, said he would willingly give one of his provinces in the Low Countries for such a place; there being, as he thought, nowhere such a situation.

Henry IV also was desirous of this house, and offered to exchange any of his houses, with much more lands than his estate thereabouts was worth; to which the Duke of Montmorency made this wary answer: Sieur, la maison est à vous, mais que je sois le concierge; which in English sounds thus: 'Sir, the house is yours, but give me leave to keep it for you'.

When I had been at Merlou about some eight months, and attained, as was thought, the knowledge of horsemanship, I came to the Duke of Montmorency at St. Ilce², and, after due thanks for his favours, took my leave of him to go to Paris; whereupon, the good old prince embracing me, and calling me son, bid me farewell, assuring me nevertheless he should be glad of any occasion hereafter to testify his love and esteem for me; telling me further, he should come to Paris himself shortly, where he hoped to see me. From hence I returned to Merlou, where I gave Monsieur Disancourt such a present as abundantly requited the charges of my diet, and the pains of his teaching. Being now ready to set forth, a gentleman from the Duke of Montmorency came to me, and told me his master would not let me go without giving me a present, which I might keep as an earnest of his affection; whereupon also a jennet, for which the Duke had sent expressly into Spain, and which cost him there five hundred crowns, as I was told, was brought to me. The greatness of this gift, together with other courtesies received, did not a little trouble me, as not knowing then how to requite them. I would have given my horses I had there, which were of great value to him, but that I thought them too mean a present: but the Duke also suspecting that I meant to do so, prevented me; saying, that as I loved him, I should think upon no requital, while I stayed in France, but when I came into England, if I sent him a mare that ambled naturally, I should much gratify him. I told the messenger I should strive both that way, and every way else, to declare my thankfulness, and so dismissed the messenger with a good reward.

¹ In 1614 (see p. 107).

² Probably a blunder of the transcriber for Chantilly.

Coming now to Paris, through the recommendation of the Lord Ambassador, I was received to the house of that incomparable scholar Isaac Casaubon, by whose learned conversation I much benefited myself¹; besides, I did apply myself much to know the use of my arms, and to ride the great horse, playing on the lute, and singing according to the rules of the French masters.

Sometimes also I went to the court of the French king, Henry IV, who, upon information of me in the garden at the Tuilleries, received me with all courtesy, embracing me in his arms, and holding me some while there. I went sometimes also to the court of Queen Margaret at the Hostel, called by her name²; and here I saw many balls or masks, in all which it pleased that Queen publicly to place me next to her chair, not without the wonder of some, and the envy of another, who was wont to have that favour. I shall recount one accident which happened while I was there.

¹ The great scholar lived at Paris from 1600 to 1620; after which he came to London (See Mark Pattison's Casaubon.)

² i.e. Marguerite of Valois. M. Tallemant des Réaux (i, 165) tells some amusing stories about the ballets given by Queen Marguerite at her hotel. The Queen had been divorced from Henri IV in 1600, and her reputation was not good. Lord Herbert writes of her with greater justice in his Satyra addressed to Ben Jonson (September 1608) as that swol'n vicious Queen Margaret,

Who were a monster ev'n without her sin!

All things being ready for the ball, and every one being in their place, and I myself next to the Queen, expecting when the dancers would come in, one knocked at the door somewhat louder than became, as I thought, a very civil person. When he came in, I remember there was a sudden whisper among the ladies, saying, C'est Monsieur Balagny, or, It is Monsieur Balagny¹; whereupon also I saw the ladies and gentlewomen one after another invite him to sit near them, and, which is more, when one lady had his company a while, another would say, You have enjoyed him long enough, I must have him now; at which bold civility of theirs, though I were astonished, yet it added unto my wonder, that his person could not be thought at most but ordinary handsome; his hair, which was cut very short, half grey, his doublet but of sackcloth cut to his shirt, and his breeches only of plain grey cloth. Informing myself by some standers-by who he was, I was told that he was one of the gallantest men in the world, as having killed eight or nine men in single fight, and that for this reason the ladies made so much of him, it being the manner of all Frenchwomen to cherish gallant men, as thinking they could not make so much of any else with the safety of their honour. This cavalier, though his head was half grey, he had not yet attained the age of thirty years, whom I have thought fit to remember more particularly here, because of some passages that happened afterwards betwixt him and me, at the siege of Juliers, as I shall tell in its place.

Having passed thus all the winter, until about the latter end of January [1609], without any such memorable accident as I shall think fit to set down particularly, I took my leave of the French king, Queen Margaret, and the nobles and ladies in both courts; at which time the Princess of Conti² desired

¹ Damien de Montluc, Seigneur de Balagny, was the son of a well-known Marshal of France, who entered the service of Henri IV in 1593. Through his mother, Reuée de Clermont, he was the nephew of Bussy d'Amboise, the hero of Chapman's plays, whom he appears to have resembled in character. Sir Thomas Edmondson, the English Ambassador in Paris, reports a duel between M. D'Andelot and Balagny on 11th January 1611-2, and another in the streets of Paris between M. Pinocin and Balagny, 26th March 1612. In the latter quarrel Pinocin was killed on the spot, and Balagny died of his wounds two days afterwards. Winwood's Memorials, iii, 324, 350, 353.

² 1571-1631. Daughter of the Duc de Guise, and wife of François de Bourbon, Prince de Conti, son of the first Prince de Condé. She enjoyed a very unenviable reputation at the French court. (See Les Amours du grand Alexandre, of which she is the heroine; her own romance, Les Aventures de la cour de Perse, 1629; Tallemant des Réaux, Historiettes, i, 54; and the notice in the Biographie Universelle, 1856).

me to carry a scarf into England, and present it to Queen Anne on her part, which being accepted, myself and Sir Thomas Lucy¹ (whose second I had been twice in France, against two cavaliers of our nation, who yet were hindered to fight with us in the field, where we attended them), we came on our way as far as Dieppe in Normandy, and there took ship about the beginning of February, when so furious a storm arose, that with very great danger we were at sea all night. The master of our ship lost both the use of his compass and his reason; for not knowing whither he was carried by the tempest, all the help he had was by the lightnings, which, together with thunder very frequently that night, terrified him, yet gave the advantage sometimes to discover whether we were upon our coast, to which he thought by the course of his glasses we were near approached. And now towards day we found ourselves, by great providence of God, within view of Dover, to which the master of our ship did make. The men of Dover rising betimes in the morning to see whether any ship were coming towards them, were in great numbers upon the shore, as believing the tempest, which had thrown down barns and trees near the town, might give them the benefit of some wreck, if perchance any ship were driven thitherwards. We coming thus in extreme danger straight upon the pier of Dover, which stands out in the sea, our ship was unfortunately split against it; the master said, Mes amies, nous sommes perdus; or, My friends, we are cast away. When myself who heard the ship crack against the pier, and then found by the master's words it was time for every one to save themselves, if they could, got out of my cabin (though very sea-sick), and climbing up the mast a little way, drew my sword and flourished it; they at Dover having this sign given them, adventured in a shallop of six oars to relieve us, which being come with great danger to the side of our ship, I got into it first with my sword in my hand. and called for Sir Thomas Lucy, saying, that if any man offered to get in before him, I should resist him with my sword ; whereupon a faithful servant of his taking Sir Thomas Lucy out of the cabin, who was half dead of sea-sickness, put him into my arms, whom after I had received, I bid the shallop make away for shore, and the rather that I saw another shallop coming to relieve us ; when a post from France, who carried letters, finding the ship still rent more and more, adventured to leap from the top of our ship into the shallop, where falling fortunately on some of the stronger timber of the boat, and not on the planks, which he must needs have broken, and so sunk us, had he fallen upon them, escaped together with us two, unto the land. I must confess myself, as also the seamen that were in the shallop, thought once to have killed him for this desperate attempt ; but finding no harm followed, we escaped together unto the land, from whence we sent more shallops, and so made means to save both men and horses that were in the ship, which yet itself was wholly split and cast away, insomuch that in pity to the master, Sir Thomas Lucy and myself gave thirty pounds towards his loss, which yet was not so great as we thought, since the tide now ebbing, he recovered the broken parts of his ship.

¹ Of Charlecote, Warwickshire. Eldest son (born 1584) of the Sir Thomas Lucy with whom Shakespeare is alleged to have come into unpleasant contact; was Knight of the shire for Warwickshire in six Parliaments between 1621 and 8th December 1640, the date of his death; married Alice, daughter of Thomas Spencer of Claverdon, and granddaughter of Sir John Spencer of Althorpe. A very elaborate monument was erected to his memory in Charlecote Church by his wife; it bears a long Latin inscription, in which his charitableness, hospitality, love of learning, and patriotism are specially commended. (See Dugdale's Warwickshire, ed. Thomas, i, 506, 511, 512.)

Coming thus to London, and afterwards to court, I kissed his Majesty's hand, and acquainted him with some particulars concerning France. As for the present I had to deliver to her Majesty from the Princess of Conti, I thought fit rather to send it by one of the ladies that attended her, than to presume to demand audience of her in person : but her Majesty not satisfied herewith, commanded me to attend her, and demanded divers questions of me concerning that princess and the courts in France, saying she would speak more at large with me at some other time ; for which purpose she commanded me to wait on her often, wishing me to advise her what present she might return back again.

Howbeit, not many weeks after, I returned to my wife and family again, where I passed some time, partly in my studies, and partly riding the great horse, of which I had a stable well furnished. No horse yet was so dear to me as the jennet I brought from France, whose love I had so gotten, that he would suffer none else to ride him, nor indeed any man to come near him, when I was upon him, as being in his nature a most furious horse ; his true picture may be seen in the chapel chamber in my house, where I am painted riding him, and this motto by me,

Me totum bonitas bonum suprema
Reddas ; me intrepidum dabo vel ipse ¹.

This horse as soon as ever I came to the stable would neigh, and when I drew nearer him would lick my hand, and (when I suffered him) my cheek, but yet would permit nobody to come near his heels at the same time. Sir Thomas Lucy would have given me £200 for this horse, which, though I would not accept, yet I left the horse with him when I went to the Low Countries, who not long after died. The occasion of my going thither was thus : hearing that a war about the title of Cleves, Juliers, and some other provinces betwixt the Low Countries and Germany, should be made, by the several pretenders to it, and that the French king himself would come with a great army into those parts ² ; it was now the year of our Lord 1610, when my Lord Chandos ³ and myself resolved to take shipping for the Low Countries, and from thence to pass to the city of Juliers, which the Prince [Philip William] of Orange resolved to besiege ⁴. Making all haste thither, we found the siege newly begun ; the Low Country army assisted by 4,000 English under the command of Sir Edward Cecil ⁵. We had not been long there, when the Marshal de la Châtre ⁶, instead of Henry

¹ A print of this picture, engraved by J. Bowen, was published in 1768. The picture is there stated to be at Powis Castle in the possession of the Earl of Powis. The present Earl informs me that the picture is not now in his hands, and I have been unable to discover its whereabouts.

² On 25th March 1610, William John, Duke of Cleves, died. There were many pretenders to his Duchy ; and two of them—the Elector of Brandenburg and the Palatine of Neuburg—combined to seize it, at the instance of the Protestant princes of the Empire. The Emperor thereupon ordered the Archduke Leopold to occupy the country in his name, and the Archduke entered Juliers, one of the chief towns of the Duchy. Henri IV announced that he would support the two Protestant claimants by force of arms. Holland and England promised him their assistance. In May, Henri, who intended to head his troops, was killed by Ravallac, but the Queen-Regent and her advisers subsequently ordered Marshal de la Châtre to proceed against Juliers, where he arrived on 8th August. Already on 17th July, the English (under Sir Edward Cecil) and the Dutch had begun the siege, and Juliers surrendered on 22d August.

³ Grey Brydges, fifth Lord Chandos, a well-known courtier, was born about 1570, and was made a Knight of the Bath in 1604. Unlike Herbert, who was only a volunteer, he was one of the officers in command of the present expedition (see News out of Cleaveland, 1611). Subsequently he suffered much in health, and died at Spa, 10th August 1621. The hospitality which he dispensed at Sudeley Castle, Gloucestershire, gained for him the title of 'King of the Cotswolds'.

⁴ Subsequently (p. 95) Herbert speaks of Count Maurice of Nassau, the Dutch commander, as Prince of Orange—a title to which he only succeeded on his elder brother's death in 1618. Their father was William the Silent.

⁵ See p. 12 supra.

⁶ Marshal of France from 1594 till his death in 1614.

IV, who was killed by that villain Ravaillac¹, came with a brave French army thither, in which Monsieur Balagny, I formerly mentioned, was a colonel.

My Lord Chandos lodged himself in the quarters where Sir Horace Vere² was; I went and quartered with Sir Edward Cecil, where I was lodged next to him in a hut I made there, going yet both by day and night to the trenches; we making our approaches to the town on one side, and the French on the other. Our lines were drawn towards the point of a bulwark of the citadel or castle, thought to be one of the best fortifications in Christendom, and encompassed about with a deep wet ditch. We lost many men in making these approaches, the town and castle being very well provided both with great and small shot, and a garrison in it of about 4,000 men, besides the burghers. Sir Edward Cecil (who was a very active general) used often, during the siege, to go in person in the night time, to try whether he could catch any sentinels perdus; and for this purpose still desired me to accompany him; in performing whereof, both of us did much hazard our lives, for the first sentinel retiring to the second, and the second to the third, three shots were commonly made at us, before we could do anything, though afterwards chasing them with our swords almost home unto their guards, we had some sport in the pursuit of them.

One day Sir Edward Cecil and myself coming to the approaches that Monsieur de Balagny had made towards a bulwark or bastion of that city, Monsieur de Balagny, in the presence of Sir Edward Cecil and divers English and French captains then present, said, Monsieur, on dit que vous êtes un des plus braves de votre nation, et je suis Balagny, allons voir qui fera le mieux—‘They say you are one of the bravest of your nation, and I am Balagny, let us see who will be best’; whereupon leaping suddenly out of the trenches with his sword drawn, I did in the like manner as suddenly follow him, both of us in the meanwhile striving who should be foremost, which being perceived by those of the bulwark and cortine³ opposite to us, three or four hundred shot at least, great and small, were made against us. Our running on forwards in emulation of each other, was the cause that all the shots fell betwixt us and the trench from which we sallied. When Monsieur Balagny, finding such a storm of bullets, said, Par Dieu il fait bien chaud—‘It is very hot here’; I answered briefly thus: Vous en êtes premier, autrement je n’iray jamais—‘You shall go first, or else I will never go’; hereupon he ran with all speed, and somewhat crouching, towards the trenches. I followed after leisurely and upright, and yet came within the trenches before they on the bulwark or cortine could charge again; which passage afterwards being related to the Prince of Orange, he said it was a strange bravado of Balagny, and that we went to an unavoidable death.

¹ 14th May 1610.

² Like his elder brother Francis, Sir Horatio Vere acquired a very great military reputation by his prolonged service in the Low Countries. Cowway and Mouk, subsequently Duke of Albemarle, were among his pupils. He was created Baron Vere of Tilbury in 1625, and dying in 1635 was buried in Westminster Abbey.

³ i.e. curtain—the name applied in fortification to the portion of a rampart situated between two bastions and uniting their flanks.

I could relate divers things of note concerning myself, during the siege; but do forbear, lest I should relish too much of vanity: it shall suffice, that my passing over the ditch unto the wall, first of all the nations there, is set down by William Crosse, master of arts, and soldier, who hath written and printed the history of the Low Countries¹.

There happened during this siege a particular quarrel betwixt me and the Lord of Walden², eldest son to the Earl of Suffolk, Lord Treasurer of England at that time, which I do but unwillingly relate, in regard of the great esteem I have of that noble family; howbeit, to avoid misreports, I have thought fit to set it down truly³. That Lord having been invited to a ¹ In all previous editions this name is wrongly printed Crofts; but no person of that name (so far as I have been able to discover), wrote on the siege of Juliers. William Crosse, ‘Mr of Arts’, however, published in 1627 a second impression of Grimstone’s General Historie of the Netherlands, with a continuation of the narrative from 1608—the date of the first edition—to 1627. Crosse writes thus (p. 1294), of the fall of Juliers: ‘The English sapped or mined first into the wall before Chailillon or Bethan had advanced so farre; the truth whereof Sir Edward Herbert, now Lord Herbert of Castle Island, can approve; who carried himself most valiantly in all that Service, and brought away a mark of Honour, as being the first of all the Nations then passed over into the wall. This I speake not out of any nationall partialitie, Truth being nearer to me than my Countrey, but onely that I might quit myselfe from that imputation, which conceiveth deserves in an historicall consistorie: and there specially, whereas our owne, not other men’s actions, are interpreted and questionable’. In the margin Crosse quaintly writes: ‘Gentle reader, if you chance to see any copie with any other name than that of Sir Edw. Herbert here specified, know it was mistaken in the printing.’ There are no other references to Herbert in Crosse’s account of the campaign.

² Theophilus, created Lord Howard of Walden in 1603, was the eldest son of Thomas, first Earl of Suffolk. He was an officer in the present expedition, was subsequently Governor of Jersey (1621), succeeded his father as Earl (1626), was made K.G. (1628), held the offices of Privy Councillor, Constable of Dover Castle, and Captain of the Band of Pensioners, and died 3d June 1640. Collins’ Peerage, ed. Brydges, iii, 155.

³ Peyton, Lord Howard of Walden’s second, drew up an account of this quarrel, which I have printed from the Lausdowne MS. (XC) in Appendix V. Winwood writes feast in Sir Horace Vere's quarters, where (after the Low Country manner) there was liberal drinking, returned not long after to Sir Edward Cecil's quarters, at which time I speaking merrily to him, upon some slight occasion, he took that offence at me, which he would not have done at another time, insomuch that he came towards me in a violent manner, which I perceiving, did more than half-way meet him ; but the company were so vigilant upon us, that before any blow passed we were separated ; howbeit, because he made towards me, I thought fit the next day to send him a challenge, telling him, that if he had anything to say to me, I would meet him in such a place as no man should interrupt us¹. Shortly after this Sir Thomas Peyton² came to me on his part, and told me my Lord would fight with me on horseback with single sword ; 'and', said he, 'I will be his second ; where is yours ?' I replied, that neither his Lordship nor myself brought over any great horses with us ; that I knew he might much better borrow one than myself ; howbeit, as soon as he showed me the place, he should find me there on horseback or on foot ; whereupon both of us riding together upon two geldings to the side of a wood, Peyton said he chose that place, and the time, break of day the next morning. I told him I would fail neither place nor time, though I knew not where to get a better horse than the nag I rid on ; 'and as for a second, I shall trust to your nobleness, who, I know, will see fair play betwixt us, though you come on his side'. But he urging me again to provide a second, I told him I could promise for none but myself, and that if I spoke to any of my friends in the army to this purpose, I doubted lest the business might be discovered and prevented.

to Salisbury, 22d August 1610 : 'Sir Edward Herbert (will they, nill they) hath forced a quarrel since my coming from the army, first upon my Lord Walden, after upon Sir Thomas Somerset [see p. 66] . . . Wherein he hath offered an irreparable injurie to my Lord Generall [Sir Edward Cecil] who hath treated him, as he hath done them all, with an exceeding love and kindness'.—Winwood's Memorials, iii, 210.

¹ According to Peyton's account (printed in Appendix V), Sir Edward Cecil intervened early in the quarrel, and with the consent of both parties arranged a reconciliation. On 11th September, however, when the troops were returning home, Herbert made some vague rumours an excuse for renewing the former challenge. His conduct was censured on all sides.

² In the Lansdowne MS. (printed below) Peyton's Christian name seems to be 'Jo', i.e. John. Sir Thomas, who was M.P. for Dunwich in 1587 and Custodian of Plymouth, had a grandson, John, who settled in Virginia in 1644. Another Thomas Peyton was the author of a very rare poem, The Glasse of Time (Lond. 1620). Sir Thomas' fourth son, Sir Henry, was the most prominent member of the family at James I's court.

He was no sooner gone from me, but night drew on, myself resolving in the meantime to rest under a fair oak all night ; after this, tying my horse by the bridle unto another tree, I had not now rested two hours, when I found some fires nearer to me than I thought was possible in so solitary a place ; whereupon also having the curiosity to see the reason hereof, I got on horseback again, and had not rode very far, when by the talk of the soldiers there, I found I was in the Scotch quarter, where, finding in a stable a very fair horse of service, I desired to know whether he might be bought for any reasonable sum of money ; but a soldier replying it was their captain's, Sir James Areskin's chief horse ¹, I demanded for Sir James, but the soldier answering he was not within the quarter, I demanded then for his lieutenant, whereupon the soldier courteously desired him to come to me. This lieutenant was called Montgomery, and had the reputation of a gallant man ; I told him that I would very fain buy a horse, and, if it were possible, the horse I saw but a little before ; but he telling me none was to be sold there, I offered to leave in his hands 100 pieces, if he would lend me a good horse for a day or two, he to restore me the money again when I delivered him the horse in good plight, and did besides bring him some present as a gratuity.

The lieutenant, though he did not know me, suspected I had some private quarrel, and that I desired this horse to fight on, and thereupon told me, ' Sir, whosoever you are, you seem to be a person of worth, and you shall have the best horse in the stable ; and if you have a quarrel and want a second, I offer myself to serve you upon another horse, and if you will let me go along with you upon these terms, I will ask no pawn of you for the horse '. I told him I would use no second, and I desired him to accept 100 pieces, which I had there about me, in pawn for the horse, and he should hear from me shortly again ; and that though I did not take his noble offer of coming along with me, I should evermore rest much obliged to him ; whereupon giving him my purse with the money in it, I got upon his horse, and left my nag besides with him.

Riding thus away about twelve o'clock at night to the wood from whence I came, I alighted from my horse and rested there till morning ; the day now breaking I got on horseback, and attended the Lord of Walden with his second. The first person that appeared was a footman, who I heard afterwards was sent by the Lady of Walden ¹, who as soon as he saw me, ran back again with all speed ; I meant once to pursue him, but that I thought it better at last to keep my place. About two hours after Sir William St. Leger, now Lord President of Munster ², came to me, and told me he knew the cause of my being there, and that the business was discovered by the Lord Walden's rising so early that morning, and the suspicion that he meant to fight with me, and had Sir Thomas Peyton with him, and that he would ride to him, and that there were thirty or forty sent after us, to hinder us from meeting. Shortly after many more came to the place where I was, and told me I must not fight, and that they were sent for the same purpose, and that it was to no purpose to stay there, and thence rode to seek the Lord of Walden. I stayed yet two hours longer, but finding still more company came in, rode back again to the Scotch quarters, and delivered the horse back again, and received my money and nag from Lieutenant Montgomery, and so withdrew myself to the French quarters, till I did find some convenient time to send again to the Lord Walden.

¹ Areskin is probably a misreading for Erskine. James I gave places at court to several of the name, who had accompanied him from Scotland. I have not been able to specially identify Sir James.

Being among the French, I remembered myself of the bravado of Monsieur Balagny, and coming to him, told him, I knew how brave a man he was, and that as he had put me to one trial of daring, when I was last with him in his trenches, I would put him to another ; saying I heard he had a fair mistress, and that the scarf he wore was her gift, and that I would maintain I had a worthier mistress than he, and that I would do as much for her sake as he, or any else durst do for his. Balagny hereupon looking merrily upon me, said, ' If we shall try who is the abler man to serve his mistress, let both of us get two wenches, and he that doth his business best, let him be the braver man ' ; and that, for his part, he had no mind to fight on that quarrel. I, looking hereupon somewhat disdainfully on him, said he spoke more like a paillard ³ than a cavalier ; to which he answering nothing, I rid my ways, and afterwards went to Monsieur Terant, a French gentleman that belonged to the Duke of Montmorency, formerly mentioned : who telling me he had a quarrel with another gentleman, I offered to be his second, but he saying he was provided already, I rode thence to the English quarters, attending some fit occasion to send again to the Lord Walden. I came no sooner thither, but I found Sir Thomas Somerset¹ with eleven or twelve more in the head of the English, who were then drawing forth in a body or squadron, who seeing me on horseback, with a footman only that attended me, gave me some affronting words, for my quarrelling with the Lord of Walden : whereupon I alighted, and giving my horse to my lacquey, drew my sword, which he no sooner saw, but he drew his, and also all the company with him. I running hereupon amongst them, put by some of their thrusts, and making towards him in particular, put by a thrust of his, and had certainly run him through, but that one Lieutenant Prichard, at that instant taking me by the shoulder, turned me aside ; but I, recovering myself again, ran at him a second time, which he perceiving, retired himself with the company to the tents which were near, though not so fast but I hurt one Proger, and some others also that were with him. But they being all at last got within the tents, I finding now nothing else to be done, got to my horse again, having received only a slight hurt on the outside of my ribs, and two thrusts, the one through the skirts of my doublet, and the other through my breeches, and about eighteen nicks upon my sword and hilt, and so rode to the trenches before Juliers, where our soldiers were.

¹ Lady Howard of Walden was Elizabeth, daughter of George Hume, Earl of Dunbar

² He held his post throughout the rebellion of 1641.

³ i.e. a dissolute fellow (Mod. Fr.)

Not long after this, the town being now surrendered², and everybody preparing to go their ways, I sent again a gentleman to the Lord of Walden to offer him the meeting with my sword : but this was avoided not very handsomely by him (contrary to what Sir Henry Rich, now Earl of Holland, persuaded him).

After having taken leave of his Excellency Sir Edward Cecil, I thought fit to return on my way homewards as far as Dusseldorf. I had been scarce two hours in my lodgings

¹ Third son of Edward, Earl of Worcester, Lord Privy Seal to Queen Elizabeth and King James. Sir Thomas was Master of the Horse to Queen Anne, was made a Knight of the Bath in 1604, and created Viscount Somerset of Cashel in Ireland on 8th December 1626.

² 22d August 1610.

when one Lieutenant Hamilton brought a letter from Sir James Areskin (who was then in town likewise) unto me, the effect whereof was, that in regard his Lieutenant Montgomery had told him that I had the said James Areskin's consent for borrowing his horse, he did desire me to do one of two things, which was, either to disavow the said words, which he thought in his conscience I never spake, or if I would justify them, then to appoint time and place to fight with him. Having considered a while what I was to do in this case, I told Lieutenant Hamilton that I thought myself bound in honour to accept the more noble part of his proposition, which was to fight with him, when yet perchance it might be easy enough for me to say that I had his horse upon other terms than was affirmed; whereupon also giving Lieutenant Hamilton the length of my sword, I told him that as soon as ever he had matched it, I would fight with him, wishing him further to make haste, since I desired to end the business as speedily as could be. Lieutenant Hamilton hereupon returning back, met in a cross street (I know not by what miraculous adventure) Lieutenant Montgomery, conveying divers of the hurt and maimed soldiers at the siege of Juliers unto that town, to be lodged and dressed by the chirurgeons there; Hamilton hereupon calling to Montgomery, told him the effects of his captain's letter, together with my answer, which Montgomery no sooner heard, but he replied (as Hamilton told me afterwards), 'I see that noble gentleman chooseth rather to fight than to contradict me; but my telling a lie must not be an occasion why either my captain or he should hazard their lives: I will alight from my horse, and tell my captain presently how all that matter passed'; whereupon also he relating the business about borrowing the horse, in that manner I formerly set down, which as soon as Sir James Areskin heard, he sent Lieutenant Hamilton to me presently again, to tell me he was satisfied how the business passed, and that he had nothing to say to me, but that he was my most humble servant, and was sorry he ever questioned me in that manner.

Some occasions detaining me in Dusseldorf, the next day Lieutenant Montgomery came to me, and told me he was in danger of losing his place, and desired me to make means to his Excellency the Prince of Orange that he might not be cashiered, or else that he was undone. I told him that either

I would keep him in his place, or take him as my companion and friend, and allow him sufficient means till I could provide him another as good as it ; which he taking very kindly, but desiring chiefly he might go with my letter to the Prince of Orange, I obtained at last he should be restored to his place again.

And now taking boat, I passed along the river of Rhine to the Low Countries, where after some stay, I went to Antwerp and Brussels ; and having passed some time in the court there, went from thence to Calais, where taking ship I arrived at Dover, and so went to London. I had scarce been two days there, when the Lords of the Council sending for me, ended the difference betwixt the Lord of Walden and myself. And now, if I may say it without vanity, I was in great esteem both in court and city ; many of the greatest desiring my company, though yet before that time I had no acquaintance with them. Richard, Earl of Dorset¹, to whom otherwise I was a stranger, one day invited me to Dorset House, where bringing me into his gallery, and showing me many pictures, he at last brought me to a frame covered with green taffeta, and asked me who I thought was there ; and therewithal presently drawing the curtain, showed me my own picture ; whereupon demanding how his Lordship came to have it, he answered, that he had heard so many brave things of me, that he got a copy of a picture which one Larkin a painter drew for me, the original whereof I intended before my departure to the Low Countries for Sir Thomas Lucy². But not only the Earl of Dorset, but a greater person³ than I will here nominate, got another copy from Larkin, and placing it afterwards in her cabinet (without that ever I knew any such things was done) gave occasion to those that saw it after her death, of more discourse than I could have wished ; and indeed I may truly say, that taking of my picture was fatal to me, for more reasons than I shall think fit to deliver.

¹ Richard Sackville, third Earl of Dorset, grandson of the Treasurer. He married Anne Clifford, daughter of the Earl of Cumberland. His brother Edward succeeded to the earldom on his death in 1624.

² Sir Henry Fairfax Lucy of Charlecote Park, Warwickshire, still has in his possession a portrait of Lord Herbert (painted on copper), which seems to be the one presented to Sir Thomas Lucy. One of the copies of the picture to which the text refers may perhaps be identified with that in the National Portrait Gallery, London, where it is assigned to Larkin ; a good photogravure of it forms the frontispiece to Dr. Güttler's Eduard Lord Herbert von Cherbury, Munich, 1897. No artist named Larkin is mentioned in works about English Art. But one William Larkin, a picture-maker, was employed by Francis, Earl of Rutland, at Belvoir Castle in 1617, to draw portraits of members of his family (see the Duke of Rutland's Manuscripts, iv, pp. 511, 515. Historical MSS. Commission.) An artist, Nicholas Lockie, enjoyed some repute as a portrait-painter in James I's reign, and is mentioned in Meres' Palladis Tamia (1598), but the suggestion that 'Larkin' in Lord Herbert's script was a misreading for 'Lockie' does not seem likely. See Walpole's Anecdotes, ed. Womun, pp. 185 and 865.

³ Probably Queen Anne. According to Lord Herbert's own account, the Queen repeatedly showed him special marks of favour (cf. p. 69).

There was a lady also, wife to Sir John Ayres, Knight, who, finding some means to get a copy of my picture from Larkin, gave it to Mr. Isaac [Oliver] the painter in Blackfriars ¹, and desired him to draw it in little after his manner ; which being done, she caused it to be set in gold and enamelled, and so wore it about her neck so low that she hid it under her breasts, which I conceive coming afterwards to the knowledge of Sir John Ayres, gave him more cause of jealousy than needed, had he known how innocent I was from pretending to anything which might wrong him or his lady ; since I could not so much as imagine that either she had my picture, or that she bore more than ordinary affection to me. It is true, that as she had a place in court, and attended Queen Anne, and was beside of an excellent wit and discourse, she had made herself a considerable person ; howbeit little more than common civility ever passed betwixt us, though I confess I think no man was welcome to her when I came, for which I shall allege this passage :

Coming one day into her chamber, I saw her through the curtains lying upon her bed with a wax candle in one hand, and the picture I formerly mentioned in the other. I coming thereupon somewhat boldly to her, she blew out the candle, and hid the picture from me ; myself thereupon being curious to know what that was she held in her hand, got the candle to be lighted again, by means whereof I found it was my picture she looked upon with more earnestness and passion than I could have easily believed, especially since myself was not engaged in any affection towards her : I could willingly have omitted this passage, but that it was the beginning of a bloody history which followed ² : Howsoever, yet I must before the Eternal God clear her honour. And now in court a great person ³ sent for me divers times to attend her, which summons though I obeyed, yet God knoweth I declined coming to her as much as conveniently I could, without incurring her displeasure; and this I did not only for very honest reasons, but, to speak ingenuously, because that affection passed betwixt me and another lady (who I believe was the fairest of her time)¹ as nothing could divert it. I had not been long in London, when a violent burning fever seized upon me, which brought me almost to my death, though at last I did by slow degrees recover my health; being thus upon my amendment, the Lord Lisle², afterwards Earl of Leicester, sent me word, that Sir John Ayres intended to kill me in my bed, and wished me to keep a guard upon my chamber and person: the same advertisement was confirmed by Lucy Countess of Bedford³, and the Lady Hoby⁴ shortly after. Hereupon I thought fit to entreat Sir William Herbert, now Lord Powis⁵, to go to Sir John Ayres, and tell him, that I marvelled much at the information given me by these great persons, and that I could not imagine any sufficient ground hereof; howbeit, if he had anything to say to me in a fair and noble way, I would give him the meeting as soon as I had got strength enough to stand upon my legs; Sir William hereupon brought me so ambiguous and doubtful an answer from him, that whatsoever he meant, he would not declare yet his intention, which was really, as I found afterwards, to kill me any way that he could since, as he said, though falsely, I had whored his wife. Finding no means thus to surprise me, he sent me a letter to this effect, that he desired to meet me somewhere, and that it might so fall out as I might return quietly again. To this I replied, that if he desired to fight with me upon equal terms, I should, upon assurance of the field and fair play, give him meeting when he did any way specify the cause, and that I did not think fit to come to him upon any other terms, having been sufficiently informed of his plots to assassinate me.

¹ This famous miniature-painter (1555-1617) drew portraits of all the distinguished men and women of James I's time, many of which are now in the national collections. He was buried in St. Anne's Church, Blackfriars (see Walpole's Anecdotes of Painting ed. Wornum, I, 176-83).

² I have not discovered any reference to this story elsewhere.

³ Queen Anne.

After this, finding he could take no advantage against me

¹ This is in all probability the lady mentioned above on p. 45. No attempt at identification seems possible.

² Robert Sidney, second son of Sir Henry Sidney, and younger brother of Sir Philip. was created Lord Sidney in 1603, Viscount Lisle in 1604, and Earl of Leicester in 1613. He died in 1626.

³ The wife of Edward Earl of Bedford, the well-known patroness of Ben Jonson, Drayton, and other poets.

⁴ Probably Anne, second wife of Sir Edward Hoby, a patron of Camden.

⁵ The eldest son of Sir Edward Herbert, second son of William, Earl of Pembroke (created 1651). He was created Lord Powis in 1629. He died in 1655.

then in a treacherous way he resolved to assassinate me in this manner ; hearing I was to come to Whitehall on horseback with two lacqueys only, he attended my coming back in a place called Scotland Yard, at the hither end of Whitehall, as you come to it from the Strand, hiding himself here with four men armed on purpose to kill me. I took horse at Whitehall Gate, and passing by that place, he being armed with a sword and dagger, without giving me so much as the least warning, ran at me furiously, but instead of me wounded my horse in the brisket, as far as his sword could enter for the bone : my horse hereupon starting aside, he ran him again in the shoulder, which though it made the horse more timorons, yet gave me time to draw my sword. His men thereupon encompassed me, and wounded my horse in three places more ; this made my horse kick and fling in that manner as his men durst not come near me ; which advantage I took to strike at Sir John Ayres with all my force, but he warded the blow both with his sword and dagger ; instead of doing him harm, I broke my sword within a foot of the hilt. Hereupon some passenger that knew me, and observing my horse bleeding in so many places, and so many men assaulting me, and my sword broken, cried to me several times, ' Ride away, ride away ' ; but I, scorning a base flight upon what terms soever, instead thereof alighted as well as I could from my horse. I had no sooner put one foot upon the ground, but Sir John Ayres pursuing me, made at my horse again, which the horse perceiving, pressed on me on the side I alighted, in that manner that he threw me down, so that I remained flat upon the ground, only one foot hanging in the stirrup, with that piece of a sword in my right hand. Sir John Ayres hereupon ran about the horse, and was thrusting his sword into me, when I, finding myself in this danger, did with both my arms reaching at his legs pull them towards me, till he fell down backwards on his head ; one of my footmen hereupon, who was a little Shropshire boy, freed my foot out of the stirrup, the other, which was a great fellow, having run away as soon as he saw the first assault. This gave me time to get upon my legs, and to put myself in the best posture I could with that poor remnant of a weapon. Sir John Ayres by this time likewise was got up, standing betwixt me and some part of Whitehall, with two men on each side of him, and his brother behind him, with at least twenty or thirty persons of his friends, or attendants of the Earl of Suffolk¹. Observing thus a body of men standing in opposition against me, though to speak truly I saw no swords drawn but by Sir John Ayres and his men, I ran violently against Sir John Ayres : but he, knowing my sword had no point, held his sword and dagger over his head, as believing I could strike rather than thrust, which I no sooner perceived but I put a home thrust to the middle of his breast, that I threw him down with so much force, that his head fell first to the ground, and his heels upwards. His men hereupon assaulted me, when one Mr. Mansel, a Glamorganshire gentleman, finding so many set against me alone, closed with one of them ; a Scotch gentleman also closing with another, took him off also. All I could well do to those two which remained was to ward their thrusts, which I did with that resolution that I got ground upon them. Sir John Ayres was now got up a third time, when I making towards him with intention to close, thinking that there was otherwise no safety for me, put by a thrust of his with my left hand, and so coming within him, received a stab with his dagger on my right side, which ran down my ribs as far as my hip, which I feeling, did with my right elbow force his hand, together with the hilt of the dagger, so near the upper part of my right side, that I made him leave hold. The dagger now sticking in me, Sir Henry Cary, afterwards Lord of Falkland and Lord Deputy of Ireland², finding the dagger thus in my body, snatched it out. This while I, being closed with Sir John Ayres, hurt him on the head, and threw him down a third time, when kneeling on the ground and bestriding him, I struck at him as hard as I could with my piece of a sword, and wounded him in four several places, and did almost cut off his left hand ; his two men this while struck at me, but it pleased God even miraculously to defend me ; for when I lifted up my sword to strike at Sir John Ayres, I bore off their blows half a dozen times. His friends now finding him in this danger, took him by his head and shoulders, and drew him from betwixt my legs, and carried him along with them through Whitehall, at the stairs whereof he took boat. Sir Herbert Croft³ (as he told me afterwards) met him upon the water vomiting all the way, which I believe was caused by the violence of the first thrust I gave him. His servants, brother, and friends, being now retired also, I remained master of the place and his weapons; having first wrested his dagger from him, and afterwards struck his sword out of his hand.

¹ Thomas Howard, father of Theophilus, Lord Howard of Walden ; with whom Herbert had lately quarrelled.

² From 1622 to 1629. Strafford was his successor in Ireland. He was raised to the Peerage (1622), while Controller of James I's household. His son and heir was Lucius Cary, second Viscount Falkland.

³ Born about 1571 ; eldest son of Edward, the eldest son of Sir James Croft, well-known in Elizabeth's reign (see p. 44, supra) ; Knight of the Shire for Hereford, 1592

This being done, I retired to a friend's house in the Strand, where I sent for a surgeon, who searching my wound on the right side, and finding it not to be mortal, cured me in the space of some ten days, during which time I received many noble visits and messages from some of the best in the kingdom. Being now fully recovered of my hurts, I desired Sir Robert Harley¹ to go to Sir John Ayres, and tell him, that though I thought he had not so much honour left in him, that I could be any way ambitious to get it, yet that I desired to see him in the field with his sword in his hand: the answer that he sent was, that I had whored his wife, and that he would kill me with a musket out of a window.

The Lords of the Privy Council, who had first sent for my sword, that they might see the little fragment of a weapon with which I had so behaved myself, as perchance the like had not been heard in any credible way, did afterwards command both him and me to appear before them; but I absenting myself on purpose, sent one Humphrey Hill with a challenge to him in an ordinary, which he refusing to receive, Humphrey Hill put it upon the point of his sword, and so let it fall before him and the company then present.

The Lords of the Privy Council had now taken order to apprehend Sir John Ayres; when I, finding nothing else to be done, submitted myself likewise to them. Sir John Ayres had now published everywhere, that the ground of his jealousy, and consequently of his assaulting me, was drawn from the confession of his wife the Lady Ayres. She, to vindicate her honour, as well as free me from this accusation, sent a letter to her aunt the Lady Crook, to this purpose: That her husband Sir John Ayres did lie falsely, in saying that I ever whored her; 1601, 1603, 1614; knighted 7th May 1603; became a Roman Catholic about 1617, and a monk of Douay, where he died, 10th April 1622. Retrospective Review, second ser. i, 491-4.

¹ Master of the Mint from 1626 to 1649; grandfather of Harley, Earl of Oxford under Queen Anne. His third wife was Lady Brilliana, daughter of Lord Cowway, whose letters (printed by Camden Soc.) are well known.

but most falsely of all did lie when he said he had it from her confession, for she had never said any such thing.

This letter the Lady Crook presented to me most opportunely as I was going to the Council table before the Lords, who having examined Sir John Ayres concerning the cause of his quarrel against me, found him still persist in his wife's confession of the fact ; and now he being withdrawn, I was sent for, when the Duke of Lennox¹, afterwards of Richmond, telling me that was the ground of his quarrel, and the only excuse he had for assaulting me in that manner ; I desired his Lordship to peruse the letter, which I told him was given me as I came into the room. This letter being publicly read by a clerk of the Council, the Duke of Lennox then said, that he thought Sir John Ayres the most miserable man living ; for his wife had not only given him the lie, as he found by her letter, but his father had disinherited him for attempting to kill me in that barbarous fashion, which was most true, as I found afterwards. For the rest, that I might content myself with what I had done, it being more almost than could be believed, but that I had so many witnesses thereof ; for all which reasons, he commanded me, in the name of his Majesty and all their Lordships, not to send any more to Sir John Ayres, nor to receive any message from him, in the way of fighting, which commandment I observed. Howbeit I must not omit to tell, that some years afterwards, Sir John Ayres, returning from Ireland by Beaumaris, where I then was, some of my servants and followers broke open the doors of the house where he was, and would, I believe, have cut him into pieces, but that I hearing thereof, came suddenly to the house and recalled them, sending him word also, that I scorned to give him the usage he gave me, and that I would set him free out of the town ; which courtesy of mine, as I was told afterwards, he did thankfully acknowledge.

About a month after that Sir John Ayres attempted to assassinate me, the news thereof was carried, I know not how, to the Duke of Montmorency, who presently dispatched a gentleman with a letter to me, which I keep, and a kind offer, that if I would come unto him, I should be used as his own son ; neither had this gentleman, as I know of, any other business in England. I was told besides by this gentleman, that the Duke heard I had greater and more enemies than did publicly declare themselves, which indeed was true, and that he doubted I might have a mischief before I was aware.

¹ Ludovick Stuart, Duke of Lennox, created Earl of (1613) and Duke of Richmond (1623), was Lord Steward of the Royal Household.

My answer hereunto by letter was, That I rendered most humble thanks for his great favour in sending to me ; that no enemies, how great or many soever, could force me out of the kingdom ; but if ever there were occasion to serve him in particular, I should not fail to come ; for performance whereof, it happening there were some overtures of a civil war in France the next year, I sent over a French gentleman who attended me unto the Duke of Montmorency, expressly to tell him, that if he had occasion to use my service in the designed war, I would bring over 100 horse at my own cost and charges to him, which that good old Duke and Constable took so kindly, that, as the Duchess of Ventadour his daughter, told me afterwards, when I was ambassador, there were few days till the last of his life that he did not speak of me with much affection.

I can say little more memorable concerning myself from the year 1611, when I was hurt, until the year of our Lord 1614, than that I past my time sometimes in the court, where (I protest before God) I had more favours than I desired, and sometimes in the country, without any memorable accident ; but only that it happened one time going from St. Julian's to Abergavenny, in the way to Montgomery Castle, Richard Griffiths¹, a servant of mine, being come near a bridge over Usk, not far from the town, thought fit to water his horse, but the river being deep and strong in that place where he entered it, he was carried down the stream. My servants that were before me seeing this, cried aloud Dick Griffiths was drowning, which I no sooner heard, but I put spurs to my horse, and coming up to the place, where I saw him as high as his middle in water, leapt into the river a little below him, and swimming up to him, bore him up with one of my hands, and brought him unto the middle of the river, where (through God's great providence) was a bank of sand. Coming hither, not without some difficulty, we rested ourselves, and advised whether it were better to return back into the side from whence we came, or to go on forwards ; but Dick Griffiths saying we were sure to swim if we returned back, and that perchance the river might be shallow the other way, I followed his counsel, and putting my horse below him, bore him up in the manner I did formerly, and swimming through the river, brought him safe to the other side. The horse I rode upon I remember cost me £40, and was the same horse which Sir John Ayres hurt under me, and did swim excellently well, carrying me and his back above water; whereas that little nag upon which Richard Griffiths rid, swam so low, that he must needs have drowned, if I had not supported him.

¹ See p. 28 supra.

I will tell one history more of this horse, which I bought of my cousin Fowler of the Grange, because it is memorable. I was passing over a bridge not far from Colebrook, which had no barrier on the one side, and a hole in the bridge not far from the middle; my horse, although lusty, yet being very timorous, and seeing besides but very little on the right eye, started so much at the hole, that upon a sudden he had put half his body lengthways over the side of the bridge, and was ready to fall into the river, with his fore-foot and hinder-foot on the right side, when I, foreseeing the danger I was in if I fell down, clapt my left foot, together with the stirrup and spur, flat-long to the left side, and so made him leap upon all four into the river, whence, after some three or four plunges, he brought me to land.

The year 1614 was now entering, when I understood that the Low Country and Spanish army would be in the field that year¹; this made me resolve to offer my service to the Prince of Orange, who upon my coming did much welcome me, not suffering me almost to eat anywhere but at his table, and carrying me abroad the afternoon in his coach, to partake of those entertainments he delighted in when there was no pressing occasion. The Low-Country army being now ready, his Excellency prepared to go into the field; in the way to which he took me in his coach, and sometimes in a waggon after the Low-Country fashion, to the great envy of the English and French

¹ The old dispute (see p. 60 supra) concerning Cleves and Juliers broke out again in 1614. The joint-holders of the territory, Wolfgang William, the Palatine of Neuburg, and the Elector of Brandenburg had now quarrelled, and the former joined the Emperor, declaring himself a Catholic. The Spanish general Spinola, with the consent of the Spanish King, levied a large force, and, nominally in support of the Palatine of Neuburg, but really in behalf of the Catholic Emperor, invaded the country. The Dutch, alarmed at the presence of Spinola, also entered the disputed duchies and seized Emmerich and Rees in the duchy of Cleves. Count Maurice of Nassau, as before, led the Dutch troops, and with him served Sir Horace Vere, Lord Herbert, and many other English volunteers. In September 1614, a vain effort was made in England to induce James I to send an army to the aid of the Elector of Brandenburg and Holland.

chief commanders, who expected that honour. Being now arrived near Emmerich, one with a most humble petition came from a monastery of nuns, most humbly desiring that the soldiers might not violate their honour nor their monastery, whereupon I was a most humble suitor to his Excellency to spare them, which he granted; but, said he, we will go and see them ourselves; and thus his Excellency, and I and Sir Charles Morgan¹ only, not long after going to the monastery, found it deserted in great part. Having put a guard upon this monastery, his Excellency marched with his army on till we came near the city of Emmerich, which upon summoning yielded. And now leaving a garrison here, we resolved to march towards Rees²; this place having the Spanish army, under the command of Monsieur Spinola, on the one side, and the Low-Country army on the other, being able to resist neither, sent word to both armies, that which soever came first should have the place. Spinola hereupon sent word to his Excellency, that if we intended to take Rees, he would give him battle in a plain near before the town. His Excellency, nothing astonished hereat, marched on, his pioneers making his way for the army still, through hedges and ditches, till he came to that hedge and ditch which was next the plain; and here drawing his men into battle, resolved to attend the coming of Spinola into the field. While his men were putting in order, I was so desirous to see whether Spinola with his army appeared, I leapt over a great hedge and ditch, attended only with one footman, purposing to change a pistol-shot or two with the first I met. I found thus some single horse in the field, who, perceiving me to come on, rid away as fast as they could, believing perchance that more would follow me; having thus past to the further end of the field, and finding no show of the enemy, I returned back that I might inform his Excellency there was no hope of fighting as I could perceive. In the meantime, his Excellency having prepared all things for battle, sent out five or six scouts to discover whether the enemy were come according to promise; these men finding me now coming towards them, thought I was one of the enemies, which being perceived by me, and I as little knowing at that time who they were, rode up with my sword in my hand, and pistol, to encounter them ; and now being come within reasonable distance, one of the persons there that knew me told his fellows who I was, whereupon I passed quietly to his Excellency and told him what I had done, and that I found no appearance of an army : his Excellency then caused the hedge and ditch before him to be levelled, and marched in front with his army into the middle of the field, from whence sending some of his forces to summon the town, it yielded without resistance.

¹ Of Herefordshire: knighted at Whitehall, 23d July 1603 (Nichols's Progresses i, 225). He was the intimate associate of William Herbert, Earl of Pembroke, and saw much service as a volunteer in the Thirty Years' War.

² See William Crosse's account of these movements in Grimestone's Historie of the Netherlands (1627), pp. 134 & seq.

Our army made that haste to come to the place appointed for the battle, that all our baggage and provision were left behind, in so much that I was without any meat, but what my footman spared me out of his pocket ; and my lodging that night was no better, for extreme rain falling at that time in the open field, I had no shelter, but was glad to get on the top of a waggon which had straw in it, and to cover myself with my cloak as well as I could, and so endure that stormy night. Morning being come, and no enemy appearing, I went to the town of Rces, into which his Excellency having now put a garrison, marched on with the rest of his army towards Wezel, before which Spinola with his army lay, and in the way entrenched himself strongly, and attended Spinola's motions. For the rest, nothing memorable happened after this, betwixt those two great generals, for the space of many weeks.

I must yet not omit with thankfulness to remember a favour his Excellency¹ did me at this time ; for a soldier having killed his fellow soldier, in the quarter where they were lodged, which is an unpardonable fault, insomuch that no man would speak for him ; the poor fellow comes to me, and desires me to beg his life of his Excellency ; whereupon I demanding whether he had ever heard of a man pardoned in this kind, and he saying no, I told him it was in vain then for me to speak ; when the poor fellow writhing his neck a little, said, ' Sir, but were it not better you shall cast away a few words, than I lose my life ? ' This piece of eloquence moved me so much, that I went straight to his Excellency, and told him what the poor fellow had said, desiring him to excuse me, if upon these terms I took the boldness to speak for him. There was present at that time the Earl of Southampton¹, as also Sir Edward Cecil, and Sir Horace Vere, as also Monsieur de Châtillon, and divers other French commanders; to whom his Excellency turning himself said in French, 'Do you see this cavalier, with all that courage you know, hath yet that good nature to pray for the life of a poor soldier? Though I had never pardoned any before in this kind, yet I will pardon this at his request'. So commanding him to be brought me, and disposed of as I thought fit, whom therefore I released and set free.

¹ Count Maurice of Nassau, the Dutch Commander. See p. 60.

It was now so far advanced in autumn, both armies thought of retiring themselves into their garrisons, when a trumpeter comes from the Spanish army to ours, with a challenge from a Spanish cavalier to this effect, That if any cavalier in our army would fight a single combat for the sake of his mistress, the said Spaniard would meet him, upon assurance of the camp in our army. This challenge being brought early in the morning, was accepted by nobody till about ten or eleven of the clock, when the report thereof coming to me, I went straight to his Excellency, and told him I desired to accept the challenge. His Excellency thereupon looking earnestly upon me, told me he was an old soldier, and that he had observed two sorts of men who used to send challenges in this kind; one was of those who, having lost perchance some part of their honour in the field against the enemy, would recover it again by a single fight. The other was of those who sent it only to discover whether our army had in it men affected to give trial of themselves in this kind; howbeit, if this man was a person, without exception to be taken against him, he said there was none he knew, upon whom he would sooner venture the honour of his army than myself; and this also he spoke before divers of the English and French commanders I formerly nominated. Hereupon, by his Excellency's permission, I sent a trumpet to the Spanish army with this answer, That if the person who would be sent were a cavalier without reproach, I would answer him with such weapons as we should agree upon, in the place he offered: but my trumpeter was scarcely arrived, as I believe, at the Spanish army, when another trumpeter came to ours from Spinola, saying the challenge was made without his consent, and that therefore he would not permit it. This message being brought to his Excellency, with whom I then was, he said to me presently : ' This is strange : they send a challenge hither, and when they have done, recall it. I should be glad if I knew the true causes of it '. ' Sir ', said I, ' if you will give me leave, I will go to their army, and make the like challenge, as they sent hither : it may be some scruple is made concerning the place appointed, being in your Excellency's camp, and therefore I shall offer them the combat in their own '. His Excellency said, ' I should never have persuaded you to this course, but since you voluntarily offer it, I must not deny that which you think to be for your honour '. Hereupon taking my leave of him, and desiring Sir¹ Humphrey Tuf-ton, a brave gentleman, to bear me company, thus we two, attended only with two lackeys, rode straight towards the Spanish camp before Wezel ; coming thither without any disturbance by the way, I was demanded by the guard at the entering into their camp, with whom I would speak ; I told them with the Duke of Neuburg² ; whereupon a soldier was presently sent with us to conduct us to the Duke of Neuburg's tent, who remembering me well, since he saw me at the siege of Juliers, very kindly embraced me, and therewithal demanding the cause of my coming thither ; I told him the effect thereof in the manner I formerly set down : to which he replied only, he would acquaint the Marquis Spinola therewith ; who coming shortly after to the Duke of Neuburg's tent, with a great train of commanders and captains following him, he no sooner entered, but he turned to me and said, that he knew well the cause of my coming, and that the same reasons which made him forbid the Spanish cavalier to fight a combat in the Prince of Orange's camp, did make him forbid it in his, and that [none] should be better welcome to him than I would be, and thereupon entreated me to come and dine with him ; I finding nothing else to be done, did kindly accept the offer, and so attended him to his tent, where a brave dinner being put upon his table, he placed the Duke of Neuburg uppermost at one end of the table, and myself at the other, himself sitting below us, presenting with his own hand still the best of that meat his carver offered him; he demanded of me then in Italian, 'Di che moriva Sigr. Francisco Vere?' (Of what died Sir Francis Vere?) I told him, 'Per aver niente à fare' (Because he had nothing to do). Spinola replied, 'E basta per un generale' (And it is enough to kill a general); and indeed that brave commander, Sir Francis Vere, died not in time of war but of peace¹.

¹ Henry Wriothesley, third Earl of Southampton, the friend of Shakespeare, had been attainted with the Earl of Essex in 1600-1, was restored by King James on his accession, and made Knight of the Garter. He died in 1624. He was captain of the Isle of Wight.

¹ Third son of Sir John Tuf-ton, and brother of Nicholas Earl of Thanet.

² i.e. the Elector Palatine of Neuburg, to whose conduct I have drawn attention on p. 76, note.

Taking my leave now of the Marquis Spinola, I told him that if ever he did lead an army against the infidels, I should adventure to be the first man that would die in that quarrel, and together demanded leave of him to see his army, which he granting, I took leave of him, and did at leisure view it; observing the difference in the proceedings betwixt the Low-Country army and fortifications, as well as I could; and so returning shortly after to his Excellency, related to him the success of my journey. It happened about this time that Sir Henry Wotton mediated a peace by the king's command², who coming for that purpose to Wezel, I took occasion to go along with him into Spinola's army, whence after a night's stay, I went on an extreme rainy day through the woods to Kysarswert, to the great wonder of mine host, who said all men were robbed or killed that went that way. From hence I went to Cologne, where, among other things, I saw the monastery of St. Herbert; from hence I went to Heidelberg, where I saw the Prince and Princess Palatine, from whom having received much good usage³, I went to Ulm, and so to Augsbourg, where extraordinary honour was done me; for coming into an inn where an ambassador from Brussels lay, the town sent twenty great flaggons of wine thither, whereof they gave eleven to the ambassador, and nine to me; and withal some such compliments that I found my fame had prevented my coming thither. From hence I went through Switzerland to Trent, and from thence to Venice, where I was received by the English ambassador ¹, Sir Dudley Carleton, with much honour; among other favours showed me, I was brought to see a nun in Murano, who being an admirable beauty, and together singing extremely well, was thought one of the rarities not only of that place but of the time; we came to a room opposite unto the cloister, whence she coming on the other side of the grate betwixt us, sung so extremely well, that when she departed, neither my lord ambassador nor his lady, who were then present, could find as much as a word of fitting language to return her, for the extraordinary music she gave us: when I, being ashamed that she should go back without some testimony of the sense we had both of the harmony of her beauty and her voice, said in Italian, 'Moria pur quando vuol, non bisogna mutar ni voce ni faccia esser un angelo' (Die whensoever you will, you will neither need to change voice, nor face, to be an angel): these words it seemed were fatal, for going thence to Rome, and returning shortly afterwards, I heard she was dead in the meantime.

¹ On 28th August 1608. Sir Francis, second son of Geoffrey, and grandson of John, 15th Earl of Oxford, served with the states of Holland against Spain, throughout Elizabeth's reign. With the peace between Spain and Holland, concluded by James I in 1604, Sir Francis's military service came to an end. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Among Herbert's poems is a Latin epitaph on him. See William Dillingham's Commentaries of Sir Francis Vere, 1657, and Fuller's Worthies.

² Sir Henry Wotton, English ambassador at Venice, on the part of James I, and an ambassador from France arranged at Xanten a pacification, 2d Nov. 1614, between the two claimants to the disputed duchies (see Dumont—Corps Diplomatique, v, pt. ii, 259). But neither Spinola nor Maurice would accept it, and the former straightway seized Wezel. The war was continued in the following year.

³ See p. 94, infra.

From Venice, after some stay, I went to Florence, where I met the Earl of Oxford ² and Sir Benjamin Rudyerd ³. Having seen the rarities of this place likewise, and particularly that rare chapel made for the house of Medici, beautified on all the inside with a coarser kind of precious stone, as also that nail which was at one end iron, and the other gold, made so by virtue of a tincture into which it was put, I went to Siena, and from thence, a little before the Christmas holidays, to Rome. I was no sooner alighted at my inn, but I went straight to the English College, where demanding for the regent or master thereof ⁴, a grave person not long after appeared at the door.

¹ Ambassador to Venice, Savoy, and Holland. In 1628 he was appointed Secretary of State, and created Viscount Dorchester. He died on 15th Feb. 1631-2.

² Henry Vere, 18th Earl of Oxford. He died at the Hague in 1625, of a sickness contracted at the siege of Breda. His wife Diana, daughter of William Cecil, Earl of Exeter, was one of the most celebrated beauties of her time. Her 'rare beauty' is the subject of one of Herbert's poems.

³ Sir Benjamin Rudyerd, a wit and poet, and the intimate friend of William Earl of Pembroke (with whose poems Sir Benjamin's were printed by the younger Donne in 1609), was one of the foremost champions of the policy of English interference in the continental quarrels during James I's reign. In Charles I's reign, as an active member of Parliament, he sought to hold the balance between the King and Commons. His memoirs were published (1828).

⁴ No mention of Herbert is made in the list of visitors to the English College printed in Foley's Records. S. J.

to whom I spake in this manner: 'Sir, I need not tell you my country when you hear my language; I come not here to study controversies, but to see the antiquities of the place; if without scandal to the religion in which I was born and bred up, I may take this liberty, I should be glad to spend some convenient time here; if not, my horse is yet unsaddled, and myself willing to go out of town'. The answer returned by him to me was, that he never heard anybody before me profess himself of any other religion than what was used in Rome; for his part, he approved much my freedom, as collecting thereby I was a person of honour; for the rest, that he could give me no warrant for my stay there, howbeit that experience did teach that those men who gave no affronts to the Roman Catholic religion, received none; whereupon also he demanded my name. I telling him I was called Sir Edward Herbert, he replied, that he had heard men oftentimes speak of me both for learning and courage, and presently invited me to dinner; I told him that I took his courteous offer as an argument of his affection; that I desired him to excuse me, if I did not accept it; the uttermost liberty I had (as the times then were in England) being already taken in coming to that city only, lest they should think me a factious person; I thought fit to tell him that I conceived the points agreed upon on both sides are greater bonds of amity betwixt us, than that the points disagreed on could break them; that for my part I loved everybody that was of a pious and virtuous life, and thought the errors on what side soever, were more worthy pity than hate; and having declared myself thus far, I took my leave of him courteously, and spent about a month's time in seeing the antiquities of that place, which first found means to establish so great an empire over the persons of men, and afterwards over their consciences, the articles of confession and absolving sinners being a greater arcanum imperii for governing the world, than all the arts invented by statists formerly were.

After I had seen Rome sufficiently, I went to Tivoli, anciently called Tibur, and saw the fair palace and garden there, as also Frascati, anciently called Tusculanum. After that I returned to Rome, and saw the Pope in consistory, which being done, when the Pope being now ready to give his blessing, I departed thence suddenly; which gave such a suspicion of me, that some were sent to apprehend me, but I going a bye way escaped them, and went to my inn to take horse, where I had not been now half an hour, when the master or regent of the English College telling me that I was accused in the Inquisition, and that I could stay no longer with any safety, I took this warning very kindly; howbeit I did only for the present change my lodging, and a day or two afterwards took horse, and went out of Rome towards Sicca, and from thence to Florence. I saw Sir Robert Dudley¹, who had the title of Earl or Duke of Northumberland given him by the Emperor, and handsome Mrs. Sudcl [Southwell], whom he carried with him out of England, and was there taken for his wife. I was invited by them to a great feast the night before I went out of town; taking my leave of them both, I prepared for my journey the next morning; when I was ready to depart, a messenger came to me, and told me if I would accept the same pension Sir Robert Dudley had, being two thousand ducats per annum, the Duke would entertain me for his service in the war against the Turks. This offer, whether procured by the means of Sir Robert Dudley, Mrs. Sudcl [Southwell], or Sigr. Loty, my ancient friend, I know not, being thankfully acknowledged as a great honour, was yet refused by me, my intention being to serve His Excellency² in the Low-Country war.

After I had stayed a while, from hence I went by Ferrara and Bologna towards Padua, in which university having spent some time to hear the learned readers, and particularly Cremonini³, I left my English horses and Scotch saddles there, for ¹ Sir Robert was the son of Queen Elizabeth's Earl of Leicester, by a daughter of William, Lord Effingham. Leicester thought it politic in his later years to repudiate this lady, and to deny that he had married her, although there is every reason to believe that she was his legitimate second wife (Amy Robsart being his first). Sir Robert was therefore never able to establish his legitimacy, though he inherited much of Leicester's property. He left England in anger, and retired to Italy; on his refusal to return to England his estates were seized by the crown. He finally resided in Tuscany and became the intimate friend of the Grand Duke. He was an exceptionally accomplished man, and his reputation as an artist reached the Emperor Ferdinand II, who created him (9th March 1620) Duke of Northumberland. Like his father, he brought serious matrimonial troubles on himself. He seems to have first married a sister of Sir Thomas Cavendish the navigator, who died young. He abandoned his second wife Alice, daughter of Sir Thomas Leigh, and took with him to the Continent (in the disguise of a page) a daughter of Sir Robert Southwell of Wood Rising, Norfolk. Miss Southwell he married abroad. Charles I created Sir Robert's discarded wife the Duchess of Dudley (30th May 1644). See Walpole's Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, vol. ii.; and Burke's Extinct Peerage.

² Count Maurice of Nassau.

³ Cesare Cremonini (1550-1631) became Professor of Philosophy at Ferrara in 1571 and at Padua in 1590. His fame as a lecturer was wide spread. He was a zealous and sympathetic interpreter of Aristotle, and published a large number of philosophical tracts.

on them I rid all the way from the Low Countries, I went by boat to Venice. The Lord Ambassador, Sir Dudley Carleton, by this time had a command to reside a while in the court of the Duke of Savoy¹, wherewith also his Lordship acquainted me, demanding whether I would go thither; this offer was gladly accepted by me, both as I was desirous to see that court, and that it was in the way to the Low Country, where I meant to see the war the summer ensuing.

Coming thus in the coach with my Lord Ambassador to Milan, the governor thereof invited my Lord Ambassador to his house, and sometimes feasted him during his stay there. Here I heard that famous nun singing to the organ in this manner; another nun beginning first to sing, performed her part so well, that we gave her much applause for her excellent art and voice; only we thought she did sing somewhat lower than other women usually did; hereupon also being ready to depart, we heard suddenly, for we saw nobody, that nun which was so famous, sing an eight higher than the other had done: her voice was the sweetest, strongest, and clearest, that ever I heard, in the using whereof also she showed that art as ravished us into admiration.

From Milan we went to Novara, as I remember, where we were entertained by the governor, being a Spaniard, with one of the most sumptuous feasts that ever I saw, being but of nine dishes, in three several services; the first whereof was, three ollas podridas, consisting of all choice boiled meats, placed in three large silver chargers, which took up the length of a great table; the meat in it being heightened up artificially, pyramid wise, to a sparrow which was on the top. The second service was like the former, of roast meat, in which all manner of fowl from the pheasant and partridge, to other fowl less than them, were heightened up to a lark. The third was in sweetmeats dry of all sorts, heightened in like manner to a round comfit.

From hence we went to Verelli, a town of the Duke of Savoy's, frontier to the Spaniard, with whom the Duke was then in war; from whence, passing by places of least note, we came to Turin, where the Duke of Savoy's court was. After I had refreshed myself here some two or three days, I took leave of my Lord Ambassador with intention to go to the Low Countries, and was now upon the way thither, as far as the foot of Mount Cenis, when the Count Scarnafissi came to me from the Duke¹, and brought a letter to this effect: That the Duke had heard I was a cavalier of great worth, and desirous to see the wars, and that if I would serve him I should make my own conditions. Finding so courteous an invitation, I returned back, and was lodged by the Duke of Savoy in a chamber furnished with silk and gold hangings, and a very rich bed, and defrayed at the Duke's charges in the English ambassador's house. The Duke also confirmed unto me what the Count Scarnafissi had said, and together bestowed divers compliments on me. I told his Highness, that when I knew in what service he pleased to employ me, he should find me ready to testify the sense I had of his princely invitation.

¹ Charles Emanuel I. Negotiations were opened early in James I's reign to marry Prince Henry and the Princess Elizabeth to a daughter and son of the Duke. From 1612-5 the Duke was engaged in a harassing war with his brother-in-law, Philip III of Spain, and in April 1615 James I sent him a present of £15,000 to aid him in its prosecution.

It was now in the time of Carnival, when the Duke, who loved the company of ladies and dancing as much as any prince whosoever, made divers masks and balls, in which his own daughters, among divers other ladies, danced; and here it was his manner to place me always with his own hand near some fair lady, wishing us both to entertain each other with some discourse, which was a great favour among the Italians. He did many other ways also declare the great esteem he had of me without coming to any particular, the time of the year for going into the field being not yet come; only he exercised his men often, and made them ready for his occasions in the spring.

The Duke at last resolving how to use my service, thought fit to send me to Languedoc in France, to conduct 4,000 men of the reformed religion, who had promised their assistance in his war², unto Piedmont. I willingly accepted this offer; so taking my leave of the Duke, and bestowing about £70 or £80 among his officers, for the kind entertainment I had received, I took my leave also of my Lord Ambassador, and Sir Albertus

¹ Scarnafissi is best known to English readers by his visit to England in 1616-7, when he sought James I's aid in behalf of his master, who had just been forced into a new war with Spain. Raleigh, who was preparing for his expedition to Guiana, seemed anxious to divert his efforts and attack Genoa in support of Savoy, but the negotiations with Scarnafissi were suddenly broken off. See Gardiner's History, iii, 49-52, and p. 95, infra.

² i.e. with Spain.

Morton¹, who was likewise employed there, and prepared for my journey, for more expedition of which I was desired to go post. An old Scotch knight of the Sandilands² hearing this, desired to borrow my horses as far as Heidelberg, which I granted, on condition that he would use them well by the way, and give them good keeping in that place afterwards.

The Count Scarnafissi was commanded to bear me company in this journey, and to carry with him some jewels, which he was to pawn in Lyons in France, and with the money gotten for them to pay the soldiers above nominated: for though the Duke had put extreme taxations on his people, insomuch that they paid not only a certain sum for every horse, ox, cow, or sheep that they kept, but afterwards for every chimney; and, finally, every single person by the poll, which amounted to a pistole, or 14s. a-head or person, yet he wanted money; at which I did not so much wonder as at the patience of his subjects, of whom I demanded how they could bear their taxations? I have heard some of them answer, 'We are not so much offended with the Duke for what he takes from us, as thankful for what he leaves us'.

The Count Scarnafissi and I, now setting forth, rid post all day without eating or drinking by the way, the Count telling me still we should come to a good inn at night. It was now twilight when the Count and I came near a solitary inn, on the top of a mountain; the hostess hearing the noise of horses, came out with a child new born on her left arm, and a rush candle in her hand: she presently knowing the Count de Scarnafissi, told him, 'Ah, Signor, you are come in a very ill time, the Duke's soldiers have been here to-day, and have left me nothing'. I looked sadly upon the Count, when he coming near to me whispered me in the ear, and said, 'It may be she thinks we will use her as the soldiers have done: go you into the house, and see whether you can find anything; I will go round about the house, and perhaps I shall meet with some cluck, hen, or chicken'; entering thus into the house, I found for all other furniture of it, the end of an old form, upon which sitting down, the hostess came towards me with a rush candle, and said, 'I protest before God that is true which I told the Count, here is nothing to eat; but you are a gentleman, methinks it is pity you should want; if you please I will give you some milk out of my breasts, into a wooden dish I have here'. This unexpected kindness made that impression on me, that I remember I was never so tenderly sensible of anything. My answer was, 'God forbid I should take away the milk from the child I see in thy arms; howbeit, I shall take it all my life for the greatest piece of charity that ever I heard of'; and therewithal, giving her a pistole, or a piece of gold of 14s., Scarnafissi and I got on horseback again and rid another post, and came to an inn, where we found very coarse cheer, yet hunger made us relish it.

¹ Sent to Savoy in May 1614 as assistant to Sir Dudley Carleton, the English ambassador there. Early in 1616 Morton became secretary to the Electress Palatine (Elizabeth) at Heidelberg. (Cal. State Papers (Dom.) 1611-8.) He was a nephew of Sir Henry Wotton, and served him as secretary at Venice. He died in 1625.

² Sir James Sandilands, a Scotch knight, was in 1604 Gentleman Usher of the Privy Chamber. In 1605 the Queen and Prince Henry stood sponsors at the christening of one of his children. He was made maître d'hôtel to the Princess Elizabeth on her marriage in 1613. He was buried at Greenwich 7th June 1618. See Rye's England as seen by Foreigners, pp. 255-6.

In this journey I remember I went over Mount Gabellet by night, being carried down that precipice in a chair, a guide that went before bringing a bottle of straw with him, and kindling pieces of it from time to time, that we might see our way. Being at the bottom of a hill, I got on horseback and rid to Burgoinc, resolving to rest there a while; and the rather, to speak truly, that I had heard divers say, and particularly Sir John Finet¹ and Sir Richard Newport², that the host's daughter there was the handsomest woman that ever they saw in their lives. Coming to the inn, the Count Scarnafissi wished me to rest two or three hours, and he would go before to Lyons to prepare business for my journey to Languedoc. The host's daughter being not within, I told her father and mother that I desired only to see their daughter, as having heard her spoken of in England with so much advantage, that divers told me they thought her the handsomest creature that ever they saw. They answered she was gone to a marriage, and should be presently sent for, wishing me in the meanwhile to take some rest upon a bed, for they saw I needed it. Waking now about two hours afterwards, I found her sitting by me, attending when I would open mine eyes. I shall touch a little of her description: her hair being of a shining black, was naturally curled in that order that a curious woman would have dressed it, for one curl rising by degrees above another, and every bout tied with a small ribbon of a naccarine¹, or the colour that the Knights of the Bath wear, gave a very graceful mixture, while it was bound up in this manner from the point of her shoulder to the crown of her head; her eyes, which were round and black, seemed to be models of her whole beauty, and in some sort of her air, while a kind of light or flame came from them not unlike that which the ribbon which tied up her hair exhibited; I do not remember ever to have seen a prettier mouth, or whiter teeth; briefly, all her outward parts seemed to become each other, neither was there anything that could be disliked, unless one should say her complexion was too brown, which yet from the shadow was heightened with a good blood in her cheeks. Her gown was a green Turkey program, cut all into panes or slashes, from the shoulder and sleeves unto the foot, and tied up at the distance of about a hand's-breadth everywhere with the same ribbon with which her hair was bound; so that her attire seemed as bizarre as her person. I am too long in describing an host's daughter; howbeit I thought I might better speak of her than of divers other beauties, held to be the best and fairest of the time, whom I have often seen. In conclusion, after about an hour's stay, I departed thence, without offering so much as the least incivility; and indeed, after so much weariness, it was enough that her sight alone did somewhat refresh me.

¹ Master of the Ceremonies to James I; and author of a curious book on ceremonies and points of precedence, known as Finet Philoxenis (ed. James Howell 1656). Weldon states that Finet was eminent as a composer of loose songs, which James I delighted to hear sung after supper. See Court of James I (1812), i, 399.

² A first cousin of Lord Herbert's. See p. 10, n. 1.

From hence I went straight to Lyons. Entering the gate, the guards there, after their usual manner, demanded of me who I was, whence I came, and whither I went? to which, while I answered, I observed one of them look very attentively upon me, and then again upon a paper he had in his hand; this having been done divers times, bred in me a suspicion that there was no good meaning in it, and I was not deceived in my conjecture; for the Queen-mother of France² having newly made an edict, that no soldiers should be raised in France, the Marquis de Rambouillet³, French ambassador at Turin,

¹ From the French naïve, mother-of-pearl.

² Marie de Médicis.

³ Charles d'Angennes, who succeeded his father as Marquis of Rambouillet in 1611. His wife was the famous Madame de Rambouillet, who presided over the well-known assemblies of wits and poets at the Hôtel de Rambouillet, in the Rue Saint Thomas du Louvre—a house which she in great part designed. Her daughter Julie (born 1607)

sent word of my employment to the Marquis de St. Chaumont, then governor of Lyons, as also a description of my person. This edict was so severe, as they who raised any men were to lose their heads. In this unfortunate conjuncture of affairs, nothing fell out so well on my part, as that I had not raised as yet any men; howbeit, the guards requiring me to come before the governor, I went with them to a church where he was at vespers; this while I walked in the lower part of the church, little imagining what danger I was in had I levied any men. I had not walked there long, when a single person came to me, apparelled in a black stuff suit, without any attendants upon him, when I, supposing this person to be any man rather than the governor, saluted him without much ceremony. His first question was, whence I came? I answered, from Turin. He demanded then, whither I would go? I answered, I was not yet resolved. His third question was, what news at Turin? to which I answered, that I had no news to tell, as supposing him to be only some busy or inquisitive person. The Marquis hereupon called one of the guards that conducted me thither, and after he had whispered something in his ear, wished me to go along with him, which I did willingly, as believing this man would bring me to the governor. This man silently leading me out of the church, brought me to a fair house, into which I was no sooner entered but he told me I was commanded to prison there by him I saw in the church, who was the governor; I replied, I did not know him to be governor, nor that that was a prison, and that if I were out of it again, neither the governor nor all the town could bring me to it alive. The master of the house hereupon spoke me very fair, and told me he would conduct me to a better chamber than any I could find in an inn, and thereupon conducted me to a very handsome lodging not far from the river. I had not been here half an hour when Sir Edward Sackville¹ (now Earl of Dorset) hearing afterwards (1645) Duchesse de Montausier, was almost as prominent a figure as herself in Parisian society. Tallemant des Réaux gives a very amusing account of father, mother, and daughter in his Historiettes, iii, 204-38.

¹ Second son of Robert, second Earl of Dorset, and grandson of Thomas, first Earl, author of Gorboduc and Lord Treasurer of England for many years. He is best known by his duel with Lord Bruce of Kildress in 1613. He succeeded to the earldom of Dorset on his elder brother's death in 1624. He married Mary, daughter of Sir George Curzon. Lord Herbert wrote a very quaint epitaph on Sir Edward Sackville's 'first child, who died in his birth'.

only that an Englishman was committed, sent to know who I was, and why I was imprisoned. The governor not knowing whether to lay the fault upon my short answers to him, or my commission to levy men contrary to the Queen's edict, made him so doubtful an answer, (after he had a little touched upon both) as he dismissed him unsatisfied.

Sir Edward Sackville hereupon coming to the house where I was, as soon as ever he saw me embraced me, saying, 'Ned Herbert, what doest thou here?' I answered, 'Ned Sackville, I am glad to see you, but I protest I know not why I am here.' He again said, 'Hast thou raised any men yet for the Duke of Savoy?' I replied, 'Not so much as one.' 'Then', said he, 'I will warrant thee, though I must tell thee the governor is much offended at thy behaviour and language in the church; (I replied it was impossible for me to imagine him to be governor that came without a guard, and in such mean clothes as he then wore.) I will go to him again, and tell him what you say, and doubt not but you shall be suddenly freed'. Hereupon returning to the governor, he told of what family I was, and of what condition, and that I had raised no men, and that I knew him not to be governor; whereupon the Marquis wished him to go back, that he would come in person to free me out of the house.

This message being brought me by Sir Edward Sackville, I returned this answer only: That it was enough if he sent order to free me. While these messages past, a company of handsome young men and women, out of I know not what civility, brought music under the window and danced before me, looking often up to see me; but Sir Edward Sackville being now returned with order to free me, I only gave them thanks out of the window, and so went along with them to the governor. Being come into a great hall where his lady was, and a large train of gentlewomen and other persons, the governor, with his hat in his hand, demanded of me whether I knew him? when his noble lady, answering for me, said, how could he know you, when you were in the church alone, and in this habit, being for the rest wholly a stranger to you? which civility of hers, though I did not presently take notice of it, I did afterwards most thankfully acknowledge, when I was ambassador in France. The governor's next questions were the very same he made when he met me in the church; to which I made the very same answers before them all, concluding that as I did not know him, he could think it no incongruity if I answered in those terms : the governor yet was not satisfied herewith, and his noble lady taking my part again, gave him those reasons for my answering him in that manner, that they silenced him from speaking any further. The governor turning back, I likewise, after an humble obeisance made to his lady, returned with Sir Edward Sackville to my lodgings.

This night I passed as quietly as I could, but the next morning advised with him what I was to do ; I told him I had received a great affront, and that I intended to send him a challenge, in such courteous language, that he could not refuse it : Sir Edward Sackville by all means dissuaded me from it ; by which I perceived I was not to expect his assistance therein, and indeed the next day he went out of town.

Being alone now, I thought on nothing more than how to send him a challenge, which at last I penned to this effect : That whereas he had given me great offence, without a cause, I thought myself bound as a gentleman to resent it, and therefore desired to see him with his sword in his hand in any place he should appoint ; and hoped he would not interpose his authority as an excuse for not complying with his honour on this occasion, and that so I rested his humble servant.

Finding nobody in town for two or three days by whom I might send this challenge, I resolved for my last means to deliver it in person, and observe how he took it, intending to right myself as I could, when I found he stood upon his authority.

This night it happened that Monsieur Terant, formerly mentioned, came to the town ; this gentleman knowing me well, and remembering our acquaintance both at France and Juliers, wished there were some occasion for him to serve me ; I presently hereupon, taking the challenge out of my pocket, told him he would oblige me extremely if he were pleased to deliver it, and that I hoped he might do it without danger, since I knew the French to be so brave a nation, that they would never refuse or dislike anything that was done in an honourable and worthy way.

Terant took the challenge from me, and after he had read it, told me that the language was civil and discreet ; nevertheless he thought the governor would not return me that answer

I expected ; howsoever, said he, I will deliver it. Returning thus to my inn, and intending to sleep quieter that night than I had done three nights before ; about one of the clock after midnight, I heard a great noise at my door, which awakened me, certain persons knocking so hard as if they would break it ; besides, through the chinks thereof I saw light. This made me presently rise in my shirt, when, drawing my sword, I went to the door, and demanded who they were ; and together told them that if they came to make me prisoner, I would rather die with my sword in my hand ; and therewithal opening the door, I found upon the stairs half a dozen men armed with halberts, whom I no sooner prepared to resist, but the chief of them told me, that they came not to me from the governor, but from my good friend the Duke of Montmorency ¹, son to the Duke I formerly mentioned, and that he came to town late that night, in his way from Languedoc (of which he was governor) to Paris ; and that he desired me, if I loved him, to rise presently and come to him, assuring me further that this was most true ; hereupon wishing them to retire themselves, I drest myself, and went with them. They conducted me to the great hall of the governor, where the Duke of Montmorency, and divers other cavaliers, had been dancing with the ladies ; I went presently to the Duke of Montmorency, who, taking me a little aside, told me that he had heard of the passages betwixt the governor and me, and that I had sent him a challenge ; howbeit, that he conceived men in his place were not bound to answer as private persons for those things they did by virtue of their office ; nevertheless, that I should have satisfaction in as ample manner as I could reasonably desire. Hereupon, bringing me with him to the governor, he freely told me that now he knew who I was, he could do no less than assure me that he was sorry for what was done, and desired me to take this for satisfaction ; the Duke of Montmorency hereupon said presently, C'est assez ; it is enough. I then turning to him, demanded whether he would have taken this satisfaction in the like case ? He said, yes. After this, turning to the governor, I demanded the same question, to which he answered, that he would have taken the same satisfaction, and less too. I kissing my hand, gave it him, who embraced me, and so this business ended.

¹ Henri II, Duc de Montmorency, born 1595, the idol of the French court in his youth, succeeded his father as governor of Languedoc in 1613 and to his father's title at his death in 1614. He resisted the rising power of Richelieu for many years, but ultimately found it too strong for him. He therefore entered into what was construed to be a treasonable conspiracy against the king and Richelieu, was arrested, and was beheaded at Toulouse, 30th Oct. 1632.

After some compliments past between the Duke of Montmorency, who remembered the great love his father bore me, which he desired to continue in his person, and putting me in mind also of our being educated together for a while, demanded whether I would go with him to Paris? I told him that I was engaged to the Low Countries, but that wheresoever I was I should be his most humble servant.

My employment with the Duke of Savoy in Languedoc being thus ended, I went from Lyons to Geneva, where I found also my fame had prevented ¹ my coming; for the next morning after my arrival, the state taking notice of me, sent a messenger in their name to congratulate my being there, and presented me with some flaggons of wine, desiring me (if I staid there any while) to see their fortifications, and give my opinion of them; which I did, and told them I thought they were weakest where they thought themselves the strongest; which was on the hilly part, where indeed they had made great fortifications; yet as it is a rule in war, that whatsoever may be made by art may be destroyed by art again, I conceived they had need to fear the approach of an enemy on that part rather than any other. They replied, that divers great soldiers had told them the same; and that they would give the best order they could to serve themselves on that side.

Having rested here some while to take physic (my health being a little broken with long travel) I departed, after a fortnight's stay, to Basle, where taking a boat upon the river, I came at length to Strasbourg, and from thence went to Heidelberg, where I was received again by the Prince Elector and Princess with much kindness, and viewed at leisure the fair library there, the gardens, and other rarities of that place ²; and here I found my horses I lent to Sandilands in good plight, ³

¹ i.e. anticipated.

² See p. 87, supra. Lord Herbert's statement of his intimacy with the Elector Palatine and his wife, the Princess Elizabeth, is corroborated by the letter from the Princess to him, which I print below. An interesting relic of the Elector's library here referred to, is now in the British Museum. It is the Princess's copy of Raleigh's History of the World, 1614. A curious history of the book is given by Mr. Rye in his England as seen by Foreigners, p. 222-3.

³ See note 2 on p. 87.

which I then bestowed upon some servants of the Prince, in way of retribution for my welcome thither. From hence Sir George Calvert ¹, and myself went by water, for the most part, to the Low Countries, where taking leave of each other, I went straight to his Excellency ², who did extraordinarily welcome me, insomuch that it was observed that he did never outwardly make so much of any one as myself.

It happened this summer that the Low-Country army was not drawn into the field, so that the Prince of Orange ³ past his time at playing at chess with me after dinner; or in going to Ryswick with him to see his great horses; or in making love; in which also he used me as his companion, yet so that I saw nothing openly, more than might argue a civil familiarity. When I was at any time from him, I did by his good leave endeavour to raise a troop of horse for the Duke of Savoy's service, as having obtained a commission to that purpose for my brother William ⁴, then an officer in the Low Country. Having these men in readiness, I sent word to the Count Scarnafissi thereof, who was now ambassador in England ⁵ telling him, that if he would send money, my brother was ready to go.

Scarnafissi answered me, that he expected money in England, and that as soon as he received it, he would send over so much as would pay an hundred horse. But a peace betwixt him and the Spaniard being concluded not long after at Asti ⁶, the whole charge of keeping this horse fell upon me, without ever to this day receiving any recompense.

Winter now approaching, and nothing more to be done for that year, I went to the Brill to take shipping for England.

¹ Appointed Secretary of State in 1619. He resigned the post on declaring himself a Catholic in 1625, and was soon afterwards created Lord Baltimore in the Irish peerage. See Harace Walpole's Royal and Noble Authors, vol. ii.

² Count Maurice of Nassau.

³ This is apparently another reference to Count Maurice of Nassau. See p. 60, note 4.

⁴ See p. 11, supra.

⁵ At the close of 1616.

⁶ Lord Herbert clearly acted precipitately. The terms of this treaty between Spain and Savoy were first broached in 1615. Scarnafissi received his final answer—England's refusal to aid his master—in January 1616-17, apparently before Herbert raised his troops, and the treaty of Asti was permanently determined a few months later. When Scarnafissi applied for assistance to continue the war, it is probable that both James I and his minister Somerset anticipated that the peace would be ultimately confirmed by the two powers. Raleigh's anxiety to divert his expedition to the service of the Duke of Savoy caused Scarnafissi's demand to be entertained for a few weeks, but no farsighted politician could have believed that much would come of the negotiation.

Sir Edward Conway¹, who was the governor at that place, and afterwards Secretary of State, taking notice of my being there, came to me, and invited me every day to come to him, while I attended only for a wind; which serving at last for my journey, Sir Edward Conway conducted me to the ship, into which as soon as I was entered he caused six pieces of ordnance to be discharged for my farewell. I was scarce gone a league into the sea, when the wind turned contrary, and forced me back again. Returning thus to the Brill, Sir Edward Conway welcomed me as before; and now, after some three or four days, the wind serving, he conducted me again to the ship, and bestowed six volleys of ordnance upon me. I was now about half way to England, when a most cruel storm arose, which tore our sails and spent our masts, insomuch that the master of our ship gave us all for lost, as the wind was extreme high, and together contrary; we were carried at last, though with much difficulty, back again to the Brill, where Sir Edward Conway did congratulate my escape; saying, he believed certainly, that (considering the weather) I must needs be cast away.

After some stay here with my former welcome, the wind being now fair, I was conducted again to my ship by Sir Edward Conway, and the same volleys of shot given me, and was now scarce out of the haven, when the wind again turned contrary, and drove me back. This made me resolve to try my fortune here no longer; hiring a small bark therefore, I went to the sluice, and from thence to Ostend, where finding company, I went to Brussels. In the inn where I lay, here an ordinary was kept, to which divers noblemen and principal officers of the Spanish army resorted: sitting among these at dinner, the next day after my arrival, no man knowing me, or informing himself who I was, they fell into discourse of divers matters, in Italian, Spanish, and French; and at last three of them, one after another, began to speak of King James, my master, in a very scornful manner; I thought with myself then, that if I was a base fellow, I need not take any notice thereof, since no man knew me to be an Englishman, or that I did so much as understand their language ; but my heart burning within me, I, putting off my hat, arose from the table, and turning myself to those that sat at the upper end, who had said nothing to the King my master's prejudice, I told them in Italian, Son Inglese ; ' I am an Englishman ; and should be unworthy to live if I suffered these words to be spoken of the King my master ' ; and therewithal turning myself to those who had injured the King, I said, ' You have spoken falsely, and I will fight with you all ' . Those at the upper end of the table, finding I had so much reason on my part, did sharply check those I questioned, and, to be brief, made them ask the King's forgiveness, wherewith also the King's health being drank round about the table, I departed thence to Dunkirk, and thence to Gravelines, where I saw, though unknown, an English gentlewoman enter into a nunnery there. I went thence to Calais ; it was now extreme foul weather, and I could find no master of a ship willing to adventure to sea ; howbeit, my impatienee was such, that I demanded of a poor fisherman there whether he would go ? he answered, his ship was worse than any in the haven, as being open above, and without any deck, besides, that it was old : but, saith he, ' I care for my life as little as you do, and if you will go, my boat is at your service ' .

¹ Knighted by the ill-fated Earl of Essex at Cadiz in 1596, he afterwards served in the Low Countries, as governor of the Brill. He was made a principal Secretary of State by James I in 1623 and created Lord Conway in 1624. He was afterwards Lord-President of the Council. He died in 1630.

I was now scarce out of the haven, when a high grown sea had almost overwhelmed us, the waves coming in very fast into our ship, which we laded out again the best we could ; notwithstanding which, we expected every minute to be cast away ; it pleased God yet before we were gone six leagues into the sea, to cease the tempest, and give us a fair passage over to the Downs, where, after giving God thanks for my delivery from this most needless danger that ever I did run, I went to London. I had not been here ten days when a quartan ague seized on me, which held me for a year and a half without intermission, and a year and a half longer at spring and fall : the good days I had during all this sickness, I employed in study, the ill being spent in as sharp and long fits as I think ever any man endured, which brought me at last to be so lean and yellow, that scarce any man did know me. It happened during this sickness, that I walked abroad one day towards Whitehall, where, meeting with one Emerson, who spoke very disgraceful words of Sir Robert Harley¹, being then my dear friend, my weakness could not hinder me to be sensible of my friend's dishonour; shaking him therefore by a long beard he wore, I stept a little aside, and drew my sword in the street; Captain Thomas Scriven, a friend of mine, being not far off on one side, and divers friends of his on the other side. All that saw me wondered how I could go, being so weak and consumed as I was, but much more that I would offer to fight; howsoever, Emerson, instead of drawing his sword, ran away into Suffolk House, and afterwards informed the Lords of the Council of what I had done; who not long after sending for me, did not so much reprehend my taking part with my friend, as that I would adventure to fight, being in such a bad condition of health. Before I came wholly out of my sickness, Sir George Villiers, afterwards Duke of Buckingham, came into the King's favour²; this cavalier meeting me accidentally at the Lady Stanhope's³ house, came to me, and told me he had heard so much of my worth, as he would think himself happy if, by his credit with the King, he could do me any service; I humbly thanked him, but told him, that for the present I had need of nothing so much as of health, but that if ever I had ambition, I should take the boldness to make my address by him.

I was no sooner perfectly recovered of this long sickness, but the Earl of Oxford and myself resolved to raise two regiments for the service of the Venetians⁴, While we were making ready for this journey, the King having an occasion to send an ambassador into France, required Sir George Villiers to present him with the names of the fittest men for that employment that he knew; whereupon eighteen names.

¹ See p. 73, supra.

² Late in 1614 Villiers, for whom the King had manifested a liking on first seeing him, was made the King's Cupbearer. On 23d April 1615 he became a Gentleman of the Royal Bedchamber, and was knighted. Somerset's enemies at court hoped to use him as a check to the power of the older favourite, but he was shrewd enough to turn the situation to his own advantage. Created Viscount Villiers in 1616 and Earl of Buckingham in 1618, he was at the time of which Lord Herbert is now writing all powerful in the King's Council. Lord Herbert remained faithful to him to the last.

³ Catherine, daughter of Francis Lord Hastings, heir of the 4th Earl of Huntingdon, married, in 1605, Philip, created Lord Stanhope in 1616, and Earl of Chesterfield (4th August 1628). She died 28th August 1636, and from her son, Henry Stanhope, descended the celebrated Lord Chesterfield.

⁴ According to the State Papers, the Earl of Oxford was at Venice throughout 1617. In 1618 the Venetian ambassador in London was raising troops for the service of his republic, and by 30th March had hired eight ships, in which Sir Henry Peyton and Sir Henry Mainwaring were to have leading commands. Neither the Earl of Oxford nor Lord Herbert appears to have taken an active part in this business.

among which mine was, being written in a paper, were presented to him; the King presently chose me, yet so as he desired first to have the approbation of his Privy Council, who, confirming his Majesty's choice, sent a messenger to my house among gardens, near the Old Exchange¹, requiring me to come presently to them. Myself little knowing then the honour intended me, asked the messenger whether I had done any fault, that the Lords sent for me so suddenly? wishing him to tell the Lords that I was going to dinner, and would afterwards attend them. I had scarce dined when another messenger was sent; this made me hasten to Whitehall, where I was no sooner come, but the Lords saluted me by the name of Lord Ambassador of France; I told their Lordships thereupon, that I was glad it was no worse, and that I doubted, that by their speedy sending for me, some complaint, though false, might be made against me.

My first commission was to renew the oath of alliance between the two crowns², for which purpose I was Extraordinary Ambassador, which being done, I was to reside there as ordinary. I had received now about six or seven hundred pounds, towards the charges of my journey, and locked it in certain coffers in my house; when the night following, about one of the clock, I could hear divers men speak and knock at the door, in that part of the house where none did lie but myself, my wife, and her attendants, my servants being lodged in another house not far off: as soon as I heard the noise, I suspected presently they came to rob me of my money; howsoever, I thought fit to rise, and go to the window to know who they were; the first word I heard was; 'Darest thou come down, Welshman?' which I no sooner heard, but, taking a sword in one hand, and a little target in the other, I did in my shirt run down the stairs, open the doors suddenly, and charged ten or twelve of them with that fury that they ran away, some throwing away their halberds, others hurting their fellows to make them go faster in a narrow way they were to pass ; in which disordered manner I drove them to the middle of the street by the Exchange, where finding my bare feet hurt by the stones I trod on, I thought fit to return home, and leave them to their flight. My servants, hearing the noise, by this time were got up, and demanded whether I would have them pursue those rogues that fled away ; but I answering that I thought they were out of their reach, we returned home together.

¹ 'Old Exchange was', says Stow, 'a street so called of the King's Exchange there kept, which was for the receipt of bullion to be coined. . . . This street beginneth by West Cheape in the north and runneth down south to Knightriders Street'. Survey of London, ed. Thoms, p. 121.

² Concluded 19th August 1610, while Louis XIII was in his minority. Lord Herbert's instructions were of a general character, and chiefly dealt with the necessity of maintaining the existing peaceful relations between the two countries. They bear the date 7th May 1610. I have printed them at length in Appendix VI.

While I was preparing myself for my journey, it happened that I, passing through the Inner Temple one day, and encountering Sir Robert Vaughan in this country ¹, some harsh words past betwixt us, which occasioned him, at the persuasion of others whom I will not nominate, to send me a challenge ; this was brought me at my house in Blackfriars, by Captain Charles Price, upon a Sunday, about one of the clock in the afternoon. When I had read it, I told Charles Price that I did ordinarily bestow this day in devotion, nevertheless that I would meet Sir Robert Vaughan presently, and gave him thereupon the length of my sword, demanding whether he brought any second with him ; to which Charles Price replying that he would be in the field with him, I told my brother, Sir Henry Herbert then present, thereof, who readily offering himself to be my second, nothing was wanting now but the place to be agreed upon betwixt us, which was not far from the waterside near Chelsea.

My brother and I taking boat presently, came to the place, where, after we had staid about two hours in vain, I desired my brother to go to Sir Robert Vaughan's lodging, and tell him that I now attended his coming a great while, and that I desired him to come away speedily ; hereupon my brother went, and after a while, returning back again, he told me they were not ready yet ; I attended then about an hour and a half longer, but as he did not come yet, I sent my brother a second time to call him away, and to tell him I caught cold, nevertheless that I would stay there till sunset : my brother yet could not bring him along, but returned himself to the place, where we staid together till half an hour after sunset, and then returned home.

¹ A member of Prince Charles' household (Cal. State Papers, 1611-18, p. 443). Apparently a member of the family with whom Lord Herbert's house had had previous quarrels. (See p. 14, supra.)

The next day the Earl of Worcester¹, by the King's command, forbid me to receive any message or letter from Sir Robert Vaughan, and advertised me withal, that the King had given him charge to end the business betwixt us, for which purpose he desired me to come before him the next day about two of the clock ; at which time, after the Earl had told me, that being now made ambassador, and a public person, I ought not to entertain private quarrels ; after which, without much ado, he ended the business betwixt Sir Robert Vaughan and myself : It was thought by some, that this would make me lose my place, I being under so great an obligation to the King for my employment in France ; but Sir George Villiers, afterwards Duke of Buckingham, told me he would warrant me for this one time, but I must do so no more.

I was now almost ready for my journey, and had received already as choice a company of gentlemen for my attendants, as I think ever followed an ambassador ; when some of my private friends told me, that I was not to trust so much to my pay from the Exchequer, but that it was necessary for me to take letters of credit with me, for as much money as I could well procure. Informing myself hereupon who had furnished the last ambassador, I was told Monsieur Savage, a Frenchman²: coming to his house, I demanded whether he would help me with moneys in France, as he had done the last ambassador ; he said he did not know me, but would inform himself better who I was ; departing thus from him, I went to Sigr. Burlamacchi, a man of great credit in those times³, and demanded of him the same ; his answer was, that he knew me to be a man of honour, and I had kept my word with everybody ; whereupon also going to his study, gave me a letter of credit to one Monsieur de Langhcrac, in Paris, for £2,000 ster.

¹ Probably Edward Somerset, 4th Earl of Worcester, Lord Privy Seal and Knight of the Garter, who died in 1627. His son Henry, a devoted royalist, created Marquis of Worcester (2d November 1624), was the father of the second Marquis, the well-known author of the Century of Inventions. Charles Somerset, the founder of the family, who married Elizabeth Herbert, a very distant relative of Lord Herbert, is referred to p. 9, n. 2.

² Like all the English ambassadors abroad, Herbert found great difficulty in obtaining remittances from home. Among Earl de la Varr's MSS. are a series of letters from Herbert to the Earl of Middlesex praying for payment of his salary in 1623, and frequent mention is made there of sums advanced to Herbert by 'his merchant Sauvage'. (Historical MSS. Commission, Rep. iv, pp. 299, 311).

³ Philip Burlamacchi appears to have been the chief foreign banker in London. Through him all payments to ambassadors abroad were made. Frequent mention is made of him in the State Papers.

ling : I then demanded what security he expected for this money ? he said, he would have nothing but my promise ; I told him he had put a great obligation upon me, and that I would strive to acquit myself of it the best I could.

Having now a good sum of money in my coffers, and this letter of credit, I made ready for my journey ; the day I went out of London I remember was the same in which Queen Ann was carried to burial, which was a sad spectacle to all that had occasion to honour her ¹. My first night's journey was to Gravesend, where being at supper in my inn, Monsieur Savage formerly mentioned came to me, and told me, that whereas I had spoken to him for a letter of credit, he had made one which he thought would be to my contentment. I demanded to whom it was directed ; he said to Monsieur Tallemant and Rambouillet, in Paris ² ; I asked then what they were worth ? he said, above one hundred thousand pound sterling ; I demanded for how much this letter of credit was ? he said, for as much as I should have need of : I asked what security he required ? he said, nothing by my word, which he had heard was inviolable.

From Gravesend, by easy journeys I went to Dover, where I took shipping, with a train of an hundred and odd persons ³, and arrived shortly after at Calais, where I remember my cheer was twice as good as at Dover, and my reckoning half as cheap. From whence I went to Boulogne, Monstreville, Abbeville, Amiens, and in two days thence, to St. Denis near Paris, where I was met with a great train of coaches that were sent to receive me, as also by the master of the ceremonies, and Monsieur Mennon ⁴ my fellow scholar, with Monsieur Disan-court ⁵, who then kept an academy, and brought with him a brave company of gentlemen on great horses, to attend me into town.

It was now somewhat late when I entered Paris, upon a Saturday night ; I was but newly settled in my lodging, when

¹ The Queen died 18th March 1618-19 and was buried after many delays on 13th May. Sir Gerard Herbert wrote to Carleton (19th March): 'Sir Edward Herbert is going to France and his brother Harry is gone to prepare for him'. (Cal. State Papers, 1619-23, p. 25.)

² Frequently mentioned in the letters on money-matters addressed by Herbert to the Earl of Middlesex (in the Earl of Warr's MSS.) See also Tallemant des Reaux' Historiettes.

³ Thomas Carew accompanied Lord Herbert as his Secretary.

⁴ Probably René de Menou (see p. 52, supra).

⁵ See p. 52, supra.

a secretary of the Spanish ambassador there told me that his Lord desired to have the first audience from me, and therefore requested he might see me the next morning ; I replied, it was a day I gave wholly to devotion, and therefore entreated him to stay till some more convenient time : the secretary replied, that his master did hold it no less holy ; howbeit, that his respect to me was such, that he would prefer the desire he had to serve me before all other considerations ; howsoever I put him off till Monday following.

Not long after, I took a house in Fauburg St. Germain Rue Tournon, which cost me £200 sterling yearly ; having furnished the house richly, and lodged all my train, I prepared for a journey to Tours and Touraine, where the French court then was : being come hither in extreme hot weather, I demanded audience of the King and Queen, which being granted, I did assure the King of the great affection the King my master bore him, not only out of the ancient alliance betwixt the two crowns, but because Henry the Fourth and the King my master had stipulated with each other, that whensoever any one of them died, the survivor should take care of the other's child : I assured him further, that no charge was so much imposed upon me by my instructions, as that I should do good offices betwixt both kingdoms ; and therefore that it were a great fault in me, if I behaved myself otherwise than with all respect to his Majesty : this being done I presented to the King a letter of credence from the King my master : the King assured me of a reciprocal affection to the King my master, and of my particular welcome to his court : his words were never many, as being so extreme a stutterer, that he would sometimes hold his tongue out of his mouth a good while before he could speak so much as one word ; he had besides a double row of teeth, and was observed seldom or never to spit or blow his noise, or to sweat much, though he were very laborious, and almost indefatigable in his exercises of hunting and hawking, to which he was much addicted ; neither did it hinder him, though he was burst in his body, as we call it, or herniosus ; for he was noted in those sports, though oftentimes on foot, to tire not only his courtiers, but even his lacqueys, being equally insensible, as was thought, either of heat or cold : his understanding and natural parts were as good as could be expected in one that was brought up in so much ignorance, which was on purpose so done that he might be the longer governed; howbeit, he acquired in time a great knowledge in affairs, as conversing for the most part with wise and active persons. He was noted to have two qualities incident to all who were ignorantly brought up—suspicion and dissimulation; for as ignorant persons walk so much in the dark, they cannot be exempt from fear of stumbling; and as they are likewise deprived of, or deficient in those true principles by which they should govern both public and private actions in a wise, solid, and demonstrative way, they strive commonly to supply these imperfections with covert arts, which, though it may be sometimes excusable in necessitous persons, and be indeed frequent among those who negotiate in small matters, yet condemnable in princes, who, proceeding upon foundations of reason and strength, ought not to submit themselves to such poor helps: howbeit, I must observe, that neither his fears did take away his courage, when there was occasion to use it, nor his dissimulation extend itself to the doing of private mischiefs to his subjects, either of one or the other religion; his favourite was one Monsieur de Luynes, who in his nonage gained much upon the King, by making hawks fly at all little birds in his gardens, and by making some of those little birds again catch butterflies; and had the King used him for no other purpose, he might have been tolerated; but as, when the King came to a riper age, the government of public affairs was drawn chiefly from his counsels, not a few errors were committed¹.

The Queen-mother, princes, and nobles of that kingdom, repined that his advices to the King should be so prevalent, which also at last caused a civil war in that kingdom². How unfit this man was for the credit he had with the King may be argued by this ; that when there was question made about some business in Bohemia, he demanded whether it was an inland country, or lay upon the sea ? ¹ And thus much for the present of the King and his favourite.

¹ Charles, Marquis D'Albert and Duc de Luynes (1578–1621), attached in his youth as a page to the household of Henri IV, acquired so much influence with the young prince who afterwards reigned as Louis XIII, that when Herbert arrived in Paris Luynes was virtual ruler of France. He had contrived in 1617 the murder of his chief rival, Concini, the favourite of Marie de Médicis, and Marie herself was dismissed from court to prison at Blois. His success as a bird trainer had obtained for him the appointment of Grand Falconer of France in 1616, and all offices at court were afterwards at his disposal. He became Grand Constable 2d April 1621, although it was said he had never handled a sword. He recommended the suppression of the Protestants by force of arms in 1621 with fatal result to himself. Herbert was treated politely by Luynes in the first year of his embassy (see Appendix VII).

² In 1619 the supporters of the Queen-mother released her from Blois and secured some concessions for her by the peace of Angoulême. An attempt on the part of the Queen-mother's adherents to override the treaty was stoutly resisted by an army under Louis XIII in the following year.

After my audience with the King, I had another from the Queen, being sister to the King of Spain ² ; I had little to say unto her, but some compliments on the King my master's part, but such compliments as her sex and quality were capable of. This Queen was exceedingly fair, like those of the house of Austria, and together of so mild and good a condition, she was never noted to have done ill offices to any, but to have mediated as much as was possible for her, in satisfaction of those who had any suit to the King, as far as their cause would bear. She had now been married divers years, without having any children, though so ripe for them, that nothing seemed to be wanting on her part. I remember her the more particularly, that she showed publicly at my audiences that favour to me, as not only my servants, but divers others took notice of it. After this my first audience, I went to see Monsieur de Luynes, and the principal ministers of state, as also the princes and princesses, and ladies then in the court, and particularly the Princess of Conti, from whom I carried the scarf formerly mentioned ³ ; and this is as much as I shall declare in this place concerning my negotiation with the King and state, my purpose being, if God sends me life, to set them forth apart, as having the copies of all my despatches in a great trunk, in my house in London ; and considering that in the time of my stay there, there were divers civil wars in that country, and that the prince, now King, passed with my Lord of Buckingham, and others, through France into Spain ; and the business of the Elector Palatine in Bohemia, and the battle of Prague ⁴, and divers other memorable accidents, both of state and war, happened during the time of my employment ; I conceive a narration of them may be worth the seeing, to them who have

¹ Similarly Shakespeare (it is well known) in Winter's Tale, treated Bohemia as a maritime country (cf. Jonson's Conversations with Drummond, p. 16).

² Anne of Austria, daughter of Phillip III of Spain (d. 1621), by Margaret, sister of the Emperor Ferdinand II. Her brother, Phillip IV, married (1) a daughter of Henri IV of France, and (2) his niece Maria, daughter of his sister Maria by the Emperor Ferdinand II (cf. p. 130).

³ See p. 58, supra.

⁴ 29th October 1620, one of the early decisive battles of the Thirty Years' War. Frederick, the Elector Palatine, was disastrously defeated, and his loss of Bohemia final.

it not from a better hand ; I shall only therefore relate here, as they come into my memory, certain little passages, which may serve in some part to declare the history of my life.

Coming back from Tours to Paris, I gave the best order I could concerning the expenses of my house, family, and stable, that I might settle all things as near as was possible in a certain course, allowing, according to the manner of France, so many pounds of beef, mutton, veal, and pork, and so much also in turkeys, capons, pheasants, partridges, and all other fowls, as also pies and tarts, after the French manner, and after also this, a dozen dishes of sweetmeats every meal constantly. The ordering of these things was the heavier to me, that my wife flatly refused to come over into France, as being now entered into a dropsy, which also had kept her without children for many years : I was constrained therefore to make use of a steward, who was understanding and diligent, but no very honest man ; my chief secretary was William Boswell, now the King's agent in the Low Countries¹ ; my secretary for the French tongue was one Monsieur Ozier, who afterwards was the King's agent in France. The gentleman of my horse was Monsieur de Meny², who afterwards commanded a thousand horse, in the wars of Germany, and proved a very gallant gentleman. Mr. Crofts was one of my principal gentleman, and afterwards made the King's Cup-bearer³ ; and Thomas Carew, that excellent wit, the King's Carver ; Edmund Taverner, whom I made my under secretary, was afterwards chief secretary to the Lord Chamberlain ; and one Mr. Smith, secretary to the Earl of Northumberland⁴ ; I nominate these, and could many more, that came to very good fortunes afterwards, because I may verify that which I said before concerning the gentlemen that attended me.

When I came to Paris, the English and French were in very ill intelligence with each other, insomuch that one Buckley coming then to me, said he was assaulted and hurt upon Pont-

¹ He was afterwards secretary to Sir Dudley Carleton at the Hague, and succeeded Carleton as ambassador there in 1633. He died in 1649.

² Perhaps René de Menou, to whom I have already referred on p. 52, note 3.

³ I have been unable to identify these persons elsewhere. Mr. Crofts was doubtless a relative of the Sir James and Sir Herbert Croft who have already been mentioned (see pp. 44 and 72). Master Taverner was a well-known musician of the time (see Meres' Palladis Tamia, 1598).

⁴ I have printed below a series of letters written by Lord Herbert during his embassy, which illustrate most of these incidents.

neuf, only because he was an Englishman : nevertheless, after I had been in Paris about a month, all the English were so welcome thither, that no other nation was so acceptable amongst them, insomuch, that my gentlemen having a quarrel with some debauched French, who in their drunkenness quarrelled with them, divers principal gentlemen of that nation offered themselves to assist my people with their swords.

It happened one day that my cousin, Oliver Herbert ¹, and George Radney, being gentlemen who attended me, and Henry Whittingham, my butler, had a quarrel with some French, upon I know not what frivolous occasion. It happened my cousin, Oliver Herbert, had for his opposite a fencer, belonging to the Prince of Conde, who was dangerously hurt by him in divers places ; but as the house, or hostel, of the Prince of Conde was not far off, and himself well beloved in those quarters, the French in great multitudes arising, drove away the three above mentioned into my house, pursuing them within the gates ; I perceiving this at a window, ran out with my sword, which the people no sooner saw, but they fled again as fast as ever they entered. Howsoever, the Prince of Conde, his fencer, was in that danger of his life, that Oliver Herbert was forced to fly France, which, that he might do the better, I paid the said fencer 200 crowns, or £60 sterling, for his hurt and cures.

The plague now being hot in Paris, I desired the Duke of Montmorency to lend me the castle of Merlou, where I lived in the time of his most noble father, which he willingly granted ². Removing thither, I enjoyed that sweet place and country, wherein I found not a few that welcomed me out of their ancient acquaintance.

On the one side of me was the Baron de Moutaterra of the reformed religion, and Monsieur de Bouteville on the other, who, though young at that time, proved afterwards to be that brave cavalier which all France did so much celebrate ³. In both their castles, likewise, were ladies of much beauty and discretion, and particularly a sister of Bouteville, thought to be one of the chief perfections of the time, whose company yielded some divertisement, when my public occasions did suffer it.

¹ Apparently grandson of Herbert's grand-uncle, Oliver Herbert of Marchynleth (see Genealogical Table). He was with Herbert during the siege of Montgomery Castle in October 1644.

² See pp. 52 et seq. The old Duke died in 1624.

³ Like Balagni, Bouteville had the reputation of always killing his man in his duels.

Winter being now come, I returned to my house in Paris, and prepared for renewing the oath of alliance betwixt the two crowns, for which, as I said formerly, I had an extraordinary commission; nevertheless the King put off the business to as long a time as he well could. In the meanwhile Prince Henry of Nassau, brother to Prince Maurice ¹, coming to Paris, was met and much welcomed by me, as being obliged to him no less than to his brother in the Low Countries ². This Prince, and all his train, were feasted by me at Paris with one hundred dishes, costing, as I remember, in all £100.

The French King at last resolving upon a day for performing the ceremony, betwixt the two crowns above mentioned, myself and all my train put ourselves into that sumptuous equipage, that I remember it cost me one way or another above £1,000. And truly the magnificence of it was such, as a little French book was presently printed thereof. This being done, I resided here in the quality of an ordinary ambassador ³.

And now I shall mention some particular passages concerning myself, without entering yet any way into the whole frame and context of my negotiation, reserving them, as I said before, to a particular treatise ⁴. I spent my time much in the visits of the princes, council of state, and great persons of the French kingdom, who did ever punctually requite my visits. The like I did also to the chief ambassadors there, among whom the Venetian, Low Country, Savoy, and the united princes in Germany, ambassadors, did bear me that respect, that they usually met in my house, to advise together concerning the great affairs of that time: For as the Spaniard then was so potent that he seemed to affect an universal monarchy, all the above-mentioned ambassadors did, in one common interest, strive to oppose him. All our endeavours yet could not hinder, but that he both publicly prevailed in his attempts abroad, and privately did corrupt divers of the principal ministers of state in this kingdom. I came to discover this by

¹ Prince Frederick Henry succeeded his brother Maurice as Prince of Orange in 1625 see p. 60j.

² Herbert announced his appointment in Paris to the Prince of Orange from Tours 17th June (cf. British Museum Addit. MS 7082j).

³ See Appendix VII. I have not found any proof of the existence of a book on the subject of the ceremonial mentioned above.

⁴ There is no proof that this was ever written, but his correspondence supplies the information, which he apologises for passing over here. The internal history of the French court is best studied in the Mémoires of Bassompierre and of Brantôme, in the Historiettes of Tallemant des Réaux and the early memoirs of Richelieu.

many ways, but by none more effectually than by the means of an Italian, who returned over, by letters of exchange, the monneys the Spanish ambassador received for his occasions in France ; for I perceived that when the said Italian was to receive any extraordinary great sum for the Spanish ambassador's use, the whole face of affairs was presently changed, inso-much that neither my reasons, nor the ambassadors above mentioned, how valid soever, could prevail : though yet afterwards we found means together, to reduce affairs to their former train ; until some other new great sum coming to the Spanish ambassador's hand, and from thence to the aforesaid ministers of state, altered all. Howbeit divers visits passed betwixt the Spanish ambassador and myself ; in one of which he told me, that though our interests were diverse, yet we might continue friendship in our particular persons ; for, said he, it can be no occasion of offence betwixt us, that each of us strive the best he can to serve the King his master. I disliked not his reasons, though yet I could not omit to tell him, that I would maintain the dignity of the King my master the best I could : And this I said, because the Spanish ambassador had taken place of the English, in the time of Henry IV, in this fashion : They both meeting in an antechamber to the secretary of state, the Spanish ambassador, leaning to the wall in that posture that he took the hand of the English ambassador, said publicly, I hold this place in the right of the King my master ; which small punctilio being not resented by our ambassador at that time, gave the Spaniard occasion to brag, that he had taken the hand from our ambassador. This made me more watchful to regain the honour which the Spaniard pretended to have gotten herein ; so that though the ambassador, in his visits, often repeated the words above mentioned, being in Spanish, Que cada uno haga lo que pudiere por su amo ; ' Let every man do the best he can for his master ', I attended the occasion to right my master. It happened one day, that both of us going to the French King for our several affairs, the Spanish ambassador, between Paris and Estampes, being upon his way before me in his coach, with a train of about sixteen or eighteen persons on horseback, I following him in my coach, with about ten or twelve horse, found that either I must go the Spanish pace, which is slow, or if I hasted to pass him, that I must hazard the suffering of some affront like unto that our former ambassador received: proposing hereupon to my gentlemen the whole business, I told them that I meant to redeem the honour of the King my master some way or other, demanding further, whether they would assist me? which they promising, I bid the coachmen drive on. The Spanish ambassador seeing me approach, and imagining what my intention was, sent a gentleman to me, to tell me he desired to salute me; which I accepting, the gentleman returned to the ambassador, who, alighting from his coach, attended me in the middle of the highway; which being perceived by me I alighted also, when, some extravagant compliments having passed betwixt us, the Spanish ambassador took his leave of me, went to a dry ditch not far off, upon pretence of making water, but indeed to hold the upper hand of me while I passed by in my coach; which being observed by me, I left my coach, and getting upon a spare horse I had there, rode into the said dry ditch, and telling him aloud, that I knew well why he stood there, bid him afterwards get to his coach, for I must ride that way: the Spanish ambassador, who understood me well, went to his coach grumbling and discontented, though yet neither he nor his train did any more than look one upon another, in a confused manner; my coach this while passing by the ambassador on the same side I was, I shortly after left my horse and got into it. It happened this while, that one of my coach-horses having lost a shoe, I thought fit to stay at a smith's forge, about a quarter of a mile before; this shoe could not be put on so soon, but that the Spanish ambassador overtook us, and might indeed have passed us, but that he thought I would give him another affront. Attending, therefore, the smith's leisure, he staid in the highway, to our no little admiration, until my horse was shod. We continued our journey to Estampes, the Spanish ambassador following us still at a good distance.

I should scarce have mentioned this passage, but that the Spaniards do so much stand upon their pundonores; for confirming whereof I have thought fit to remember the answer a Spanish ambassador made to Philip II king of Spain, who, finding fault with him for neglecting a business of great importance in Italy, because he could not agree with the French ambassador about some such pundonore as this, said to him, Como a dexado una cosa di importancia per una cerimonia!—
'How have you left a business of importance for a ceremony!'

The ambassador boldly replied to his master, Como por una ceremonia? Vuessa Majesta misma no es sino una ceremonia.— 'How, for a ceremony? your Majesty's self is but a ceremony' ¹. Howsoever, the Spanish ambassador taking no notice publicly of the advantage I had of him herein, dissembled it, as I heard, till he could find some fit occasion to resent this passage, which yet he never did to this day.

Among the visits I rendered to the grandees of France, one of the principal I made was to that brave general the Duke of Lesdigueres ², who was now grown very old and deaf. His first words to me were, 'Monsieur, you must do me the honor to speak high, for I am deaf'; my answer to him was, 'You was born to command and not to obey; it is enough if others have ears to hear you'. This compliment took him much, and indeed I have a manuscript of his military precepts and observations, which I value at a great price ³.

I shall relate now some things concerning myself, which though they may seem scarce credible, yet, before God, are true: I had been now in France about a year and an half, when my tailor, Andrew Henly of Basel ⁴, who now lives in Blackfriars, demanded of me half a yard of satin, to make me a suit, more than I was accustomed to give; of which I required a reason, saying I was not fatter now than when I came to France. He answered, it was true, but you are taller; whereunto, when I would give no credit, he brought his old measures, and made it appear that they did not reach to their

¹ Cf. Shakespeare's Henry V. iv. 1—

'And what have kings, that privates have not too,
Save ceremony, save general ceremony?'

² Francois de Boine, Duc de Lesdigueres (1543-1626), one of the leading French Protestant commanders throughout the religious wars of the sixteenth century, bore the highest military reputation. As a patriotic Frenchman, he never allowed his religious scruples to prevent his aiding his country against a foreign enemy. Under the influence of a young wife, whom he married in 1617, he practically renounced Protestantism late in life, and fought with Louis XIII and De Luynes in 1621 against the Protestants. His love of warfare led him to engage in it to the last. The Mistress of the Palace (Princess Elizabeth) is reported to have said, 'Si il y avait en France deux Lesdiguieres, j'en demanderais un au roi'. Sir Thomas Overbury refers to Lesdiguieres' great age in his Crumm's Fall'n from King James' Table, ed. 1856, p. 271. See Tallemant des Réaux, Historiettes, i. 87.

³ Lesdigueres' Discours de l'art militaire, dedicated to Henri IV, was first printed from a MS. in the Paris Library in 1878 in Actes et Correspondances du Comte de Lesdiguieres (Grenoble), ii, 541-78.

⁴ Foreigners were invariably the fashionable London tailors in James I's reign. In 1616 a petition was presented to the King by native workmen protesting against the presence of so many foreign handiworksmen in the metropolis. Special attention is drawn to the fact that 148 tailors were in active practice then. (Foreigners Resident in England, Camd. Soc., p. vi.)

just places. I told him I knew not how this happened; but howsoever he should have half a yard more, and that when I came into England I would clear the doubt; for a little before my departure thence, I remember William Earl of Pembroke¹ and myself did measure heights together at the request of the Countess of Bedford², and he was then higher than I by about the breadth of my little finger. At my return, therefore, into England, I measured again with the same Earl, and, to both our great wonders, found myself taller than he by the breadth of a little finger: which growth of mine I could attribute to no other cause but to my quartan ague formerly mentioned, which, when it quitted me, left me in a more perfect health than I formerly enjoyed, and indeed disposed me to some follies which I afterwards repented, and do still repent of; but as my wife refused to come over, and my temptations were great, I hope the faults I committed are the more pardonable. Howsoever I can say truly, that, whether in France or England, I was never in a bawdy-house, nor used my pleasures intemperately, and much less did accompany them with that dissimulation and falsehood which is commonly found in men addicted to love women. To conclude this passage, which I unwillingly mention, I must protest again, before God, that I never delighted in that or any other sin; and that if I transgressed sometimes in this kind, it was to avoid a greater ill; for certainly if I had been provided with a lawful remedy, I should have fallen into no extravagancy. I could extenuate my fault by telling circumstances which would have operated, I doubt, upon the chastest of mankind; but I forbear, those things being not fit to be spoken of; for though the philosopher have accounted this act to be inter honesta factu, where neither injury nor violence was offered, yet they ever reckoned it among the turpia dictu. I shall, therefore, only tell some other things alike strange of myself.

I weighed myself in balances often with men lower than myself by the head, and in their bodies slenderer, and yet was found lighter than they, as Sir John Davers, knight ¹, and Richard Griffiths, now living ², can witness, with both whom I have been weighed. I had also, and have still, a pulse on the crown of my head. It is well known to those that wait in my chamber, that the shirts, waistcoats, and other garments I wear next my body, are sweet, beyond what either easily can be believed, or hath been observed in any else, which sweetness also was found to be in my breath above others, before I used to take tobacco, which, towards my latter time, I was forced to take against certain rheums and catarrhs that trouble me, which yet did not taint my breath for any long time ³; I scarce ever felt cold in my life, though yet so subject to catarrhs, that I think no man ever was more obnoxious to it; all which I do in a familiar way mention to my posterity, though otherwise they might be thought scarce worth the writing.

¹ Lord Herbert's kinsman and the friend of Shakespeare (probably the W. H. of the dedication to the Sonnets). His mother was the far-famed Countess of Pembroke of Jonson's epitaph—'Sidney's sister, Herbert's mother'. His poems, published in 1633, attest his literary tastes. He was Chamberlain to the Royal Household under James and Chancellor of Oxford University. He died 10th April 1633, and was succeeded in his title by his younger brother Philip, created Earl of Montgomery in 1605. To these brothers, it will be remembered, the great folio Shakespeare of 1623 is dedicated. Clarendon's account of them is the most vivid and interesting. (Cf. his History of Rebellion 1705, i, 56-61.)

² See p. 70, supra.

The effect of my being sent into France by the King my master, being to hold all good intelligence betwixt both crowns, my employment was both noble and pleasing, and my pains not great, France having no design at that time upon England, and King James being that pacific prince all the world knew ⁴. And thus, besides the times I spent in treaties and negotiations I had either with the ministers of state in France, or foreign ambassadors residing in Paris, I had spare time not only for my book, but for visits to divers grandees, for little more ends than obtaining some intelligence of the affairs of that kingdom and civil conversation, for which their free, generous, and cheerful company was no little motive; persons of all quality being so addicted to have mutual entertainment with each other, that in calm weather one might find all the noble and ¹ Sir John Davers or Danvers was Lord Herbert's stepfather, having married Lady Herbert in 1608. See supra, p. 10, note 3, and Appendix III.

² Lord Herbert's servant, to whom he has already referred more than once.

³ Nothing is more singular than the rapidity with which the habit of tobacco-smoking spread in England. The herb was first brought to this country, according to Camden, in 1585. Camden, writing in the early years of James I's reign, says that 'Tobacco or Nicotiana is grown so frequent in use, and of such price that many, nay the most part, with an insatiable desire do take of it, . . . some for wantonness or rather fashion's sake, and others for health's sake, inasmuch that tobacco shops are set up in greater number than either ale-houses or taverns!' Barnaby Rich, writing in 1614, states that in that year there were 7,000 shops in London where tobacco was sold. (Honestie of the Age.)

⁴ Sir Anthony Weldon, no friendly critic, admits of James I that 'he lived in peace, died in peace, and left all his kingdoms in a peaceable condition, with his own motto Beati Pacifici'. Court of James I, ii, 12.

good company in Paris, of both sexes, either in the garden of the Tuileries, or in the park of Bois de Vincennes; they thinking it almost an incivility to refuse their presence and free discourse to any who were capable of coming to those places, either under the recommendation of good parts, or but so much as handsome clothes, and a good equipage. When foul weather was, they spent their time in visits at each other's houses, where they interchanged civil discourses, or heard music, or fell to dancing, using, according to the manner of that country, all the reasonable liberties they could with their honour, while their manner was, either in the garden of the Tuileries, or elsewhere, if any one discoursing with a lady did see some other of good fashion approach to her, he would leave her and go to some other lady, he who conversed with her at that time quitting her also, and going to some other, that so addresses might be made equal and free to all without scruple on any part, neither was exception made, or quarrel begun, upon these terms.

It happened one day, that I being ready to return from the Tuileries, about eight of the clock in the summer, with intention to write a despatch to the King about some intelligence I had received there, the Queen¹, attended with her principal ladies, without so much as one cavalier, did enter the garden: I staid on one side of an alley, there to do my reverence to her and the rest, and so return to my house, when the Queen perceiving me, staid a while, as if she expected I should attend her: but as I stirred not more than to give her that great respect I owed her, the Princess of Conti, who was next, called me to her, and said I must go along with her², but I excusing myself upon occasion of a present despatch which I was to make unto his Majesty, the Duchess of Antadour³, who followed her, came to me, and said I must not refuse her: whereupon, leading her by her arms, according to the manner of that country, the Princess of Conti, offended that I had denied her that civility which I had yielded to another, took me off, after she had demanded the consent of the Duchess: but the Queen then also staying, I left the Princess, and, with all due humility, went to the Queen, and led her by the arms, walking thus to a place in the garden where some orange trees grew, and here discoursing with her Majesty barchaded, some small shot fell on both our heads. The occasion whereof was this: the King being in the garden, and shooting at a bird in the air, which he did with much perfection, the descent of his shot fell just upon us: the Queen was much startled herewith, when I, coming nearer to her, demanded whether she had received any harm: to which she answering no, and therewith taking two or three small pellets from her hair, it was thought fit to send a gardener to the King, to tell him that her Majesty was there, and that he should shoot no more that way, which was no sooner heard among the nobles that attended him, but many of them leaving him, came to the Queen and ladies, among whom was Monsieur Le Grand¹, who, finding the Queen still discoursing with me, stole behind her, and letting fall gently some comfits he had in his pocket upon the Queen's hair, gave her occasion to apprehend that some shot had fallen on her again: turning herupon to Monsieur le Grand, I said that I marvelled that so old a courtier as he was could find no means to entertain ladies but by making them afraid; but the Queen shortly after returning to her lodging, I took my leave of her, and came home. All which passage I have thought fit to set down, the accident above-mentioned being so strange, that it can hardly be paralleled.

¹ i.e. Anne of Austria.

² See p. 57, supra.

³ i.e., the Duchess de Ventadour, sister of the young Duc de Montmorency. See p. 48, supra.

It fell out one day that the Prince of Condé coming to my house, some speech happened concerning the King my master, in whom, though he acknowledged much learning, knowledge, clemency, and divers other virtues, yet he said he had heard that the King was much given to cursing; I answered that it was out of his gentleness; but the Prince demanding how cursing could be a gentleness, I replied, 'Yes, for though he could punish men himself, yet he left them to God to punish': which defence of the King my master was afterwards much celebrated in the French court.

¹ This was the popular name of Roger de Saint Lary et de Termes Due de Bellegarde (1563-1646), grand écuyer under Henry III, Governor of Bourgogne under Henry IV, and created a duke and peer of France by Louis XIII in 1620. He is best known by his ambitious amours. Henry IV exiled him as the lover of Gabrielle d'Estrées, and later Richelieu banished him from court as the lover of Anne of Austria.

Monsieur de Luynes¹ continuing still the King's favourite, advised him to war against his subjects of the reformed religion in France, saying, he would neither be a great prince as long as he suffered so puissant a party to remain with in his dominions, nor could justly style himself the most Christian king, as long as he permitted such heretics to be in that great number they were, or to hold those strong places which by public edict were assigned to them: and therefore that he should extirpate them as the Spaniards had done the Moors, who are all banished into other countries, as we may find in their histories. This counsel, though approved by the young King, was yet disliked by other grave and wise persons about him, and particularly by the Chancellor Sillery, and the President Jannin², who thought, better to have a peace which had two religions, than a war that had none. Howbeit, the design of Luynes was applauded, not only by the Jesuit party in France, but by some princes, and other martial persons³, insomuch that the Duke of Guise⁴ coming to see me one day, said, that they should never be happy in France, until those of the religion were rooted out: I answered, that I wondered to hear him say so: and the Duke demanding why, I replied, that whensoever those of the religion were put down, the turn of the great persons, and governors of provinces of that kingdom, would be next: and that, though the present King were a good prince, yet that their successors may be otherwise,

¹ See supra, p. 104, and extracts from Lord Herbert's correspondence, 1619-21, in Appendix VII.

² Peter Jeannin, usually called President Jeannin, was one of the most high-minded counsellors that Louis XIII had about him. He brought the finances into something like order, but a lack of firmness prevented him giving full effect to his reforms. His valuable political treatise, Negotiations (Paris, 1656), was highly valued by Richelieu. Herbert announces the death of the good President Jannin to Viscount Doucaster, 23d March 1622-3. Lord Herbert's statement that Luynes pressed the King into a war with the Protestants is not confirmed by his own despatch to Secretary Naumton (dated 20th February 1620-1), in which he states that the arbitrament of the sword was first suggested by Louis XIII himself.

³ The Protestants of Béarn had resisted the decree re-establishing the Catholic religion in their province, issued in 1617. In 1621 Lewis XIII entered the province with an army to enforce the edict. An assembly of Protestants at Rochelle declared themselves independent of the crown, raised troops, and intrusted the command to the Duc de Rohan. The royal troops under Louis and Constable De Luynes made an unsuccessful attack on Montauban, and the Constable marched on Monheurt, where he died of a fever. The war continued till October 1622, when a peace was made between the combatants, practically renewing the Edict of Nantes in favour of the Protestants.

⁴ Charles, fourth Duc de Guise (1571-1640), son of the Duc de Guise assassinated at Blois, held office under Henri IV, although at one time the League had put him forward as a rival claimant to the crown of France. He fought against the Rochelle Protestants in 1622, but as a supporter of Marie de Médicis, Richelieu expelled him from France, and about 1631 he settled in Florence. Tallemant des Réaux describes him as a very amiable man, but an inveterate liar.

and that men did not know how soon princes might prove tyrants, when they had nothing to fear: which speech of mine was fatal, since those of the religion were no sooner reduced into that weak condition in which now they are, but the governors of provinces were brought lower, and curbed much in their power and authority, and the Duke of Guise first of them all: so that I doubt not but my words were well remembered. Howsoever, the war now went on with much fervour: neither could I dissuade it, although using, according to the instructions I had from the King my master, many arguments for that purpose. I was told often, that if the reformation in France had been like that in England, where, they observed, we retained the hierarchy, together with decent rites and ceremonies in the church, as also holidays in the memory of saints, music in churches, and divers other testimonies, both of glorifying God, and giving honour and reward to learning, they could much better have tolerated it; but such a rash and violent reformation as theirs was, ought by no means to be approved; whereunto I answered, that, though the causes of departing from the Church of Rome were taught and delivered by many sober and modest persons, yet that the reformation in great part was acted by the common people, whereas ours began at the prince of state, and therefore was more moderate: which reason I found did not displease them. I added further then, that the reformed religion in France would easily enough admit an hierarchy, if they had sufficient means among them to maintain it, and that if their churches were as fair as those which the Roman Catholics had, they would use the more decent sorts of rites and ceremonies, and together like well of organs and choirs of singers, rather than make a breach or schism on that occasion. As for holidays, I doubted not but the principal persons and ministers of their religion would approve it much better than the common people, who, being labourers, and artisans for the most part, had the advantages for many more days than Roman Catholics for getting their living: howsoever, that those of the religion had been good cautions to make the Roman Catholic priests, if not better, yet at least more wary in their lives and actions: it being evident that since the reformation began among those of the religion, the Roman Catholics had divers ways reformed themselves, and abated not only much of their power they usurped over laics, but were more pious and continent than formerly. Lastly, that those of the religion acknowledged solely the King's authority in government of all affairs: whereas the other side held the regal power, not only inferior in divers points, but subordinate to the papal. Nothing of which yet served to divert Monsieur de Luynes, or the King, from their resolutions.

The King having now assembled an army, and made some progress against those of the religion, I had instruction sent me from the King my master to mediate a peace, and if I could not prevail therein, to use some such words as may both argue his Majesty's care of them of the religion, and together, to let the French King know that he would not permit their total ruin and extirpation. The King was now going to lay siege to St. Jean d'Angely, when myself was newly recovered of a fever at Paris, in which, besides the help of many able physicians, I had the comfort of divers visits from many principal grandees of France, and particularly the Princess of Conti; who would sit by my bedside two or three hours, and with cheerful discourse entertain me, though yet I was brought so low, that I could scarce return anything by way of answer but thanks. The command yet which I received from the King my master quickened me, inasmuch that, by slow degrees I went into my coach, together with my train, towards St. Jean d'Angely. Being arrived within a small distance of that place, I found by divers circumstances, that the effect of my negotiation had been discovered from England, and that I was not welcome thither; howbeit, having obtained an audience from the King, I exposed what I had in charge to say to him, to which yet I received no other answer but that I should go to Monsieur de Luynes, by whom I should know his Majesty's intention. Repairing thus to him, I did find outwardly good reception, though yet I did not know how cunningly he proceeded to betray and frustrate my endeavours for those of the religion; for, hiding a gentleman, called Monsieur Arnaud¹, behind the hangings in his chamber, who was then of the religion, but had promised a revolt to the King's side, this gentleman, as he himself confessed afterwards to the Earl of Carlisle, had in charge to relate unto those of the religion, how little help they might expect from me, when he should tell them the answers which Monsieur de Luynes made me. Sitting thus in a chair before Monsieur de Luynes, he demanded the effect of my business ; I answered, that the King my master commanded me to mediate a peace betwixt his Majesty and his subjects of the religion, and that I desired to do it in all those fair and equal terms, which might stand with the honour of France, and the good intelligence betwixt the two kingdoms : to which he returned this rude answer only, ' What hath the King your master to do with our actions ? why doth he meddle with our affairs ? ' My reply was, that the King my master ought not to give an account of the reason which induced him hereunto, and for me it was enough to obey him ; howbeit, if he did ask me in more gentle terms, I should do the best I could to give him satisfaction ; to which, though he answered no more than the word bien, or well, I, pursuing my instruction, said that the King my master, according to the mutual stipulation betwixt Henry the Fourth and himself, that the survivor of either of them should procure the tranquillity and peace of the other's estate, had sent this message ; and that he had not only testified this his pious inclination heretofore, in the late civil wars of France, but was desirous on this occasion also to show how much he stood affected to the good of the kingdom ; besides, he hoped that when peace was established here, that the French King might be the more easily disposed to assist the Palatine, who was an ancient friend and ally of the French crown. His reply to this was, ' We will have none of your advices ' : whereupon I said, that I took those words for an answer, and was sorry only that they did not understand sufficiently the affection and good will of the King my master ; and since they rejected it upon those terms, I had in charge to tell him, that we knew very well what we had to do. Luynes seeming offended herewith, said 'Nous ne vous craignons pas', or, ' We are not afraid of you '. I replied hereupon, that if you had said you had not loved us, I should have believed you, but should have returned you another answer ; in the meanwhile, that I had no more to say than what I had told him formerly, which was, that we knew what we had to do. This, though somewhat less than was in my instructions, so angered him, that in much passion he said, Par Dieu, si vous n'êtes Monsieur l'Ambassadeur, je vous traitterois d'un' autre sorte—' By God, if you were not Monsieur Ambassador, I would use you after another fashion'. My answer was, that as I was an ambassador, so I was also a gentleman; and therewithal, laying my hand upon the hilt of my sword, told him, there was that which should make him an answer, and so arose from my chair; to which Monsieur de Luynes made no reply, but, arising likewise from his chair, offered civilly to accompany me to the door; but I telling him there was no occasion for him to use ceremony, after so rude an entertainment, I departed from him. From thence returning to my lodging, I spent three or four days afterwards in seeing the manner of the French discipline, in making approaches to towns; at what time I remember, that going in my coach within reach of cannon, those in the town imagining me to be an enemy, made many shots against me, which so affrighted my coachman, that he durst drive no farther; whereupon alighting, I bid him put the horses out of danger; and notwithstanding many more shots made against me, went on foot to the trenches, where one Scaton, a Scotchman, conducting me, showed me their works, in which I found little differing from the Low Country manner. Having satisfied myself in this manner, I thought fit to take my leave of the King, being at Cognac, the city of St. Jean d'Angely being now surrendered unto him. Coming thus to a village not far from Cognac, about ten of the clock at night, I found all the lodgings possessed by soldiers; so that alighting in the market-place, I sent my servants to the inns to get some provision, who bringing me only six rye loaves, which I was doubtful whether I should bestow on myself and company, or on my horses, Monsieur de Ponts, a French nobleman of the religion, attended with a brave train, hearing of my being there, offered me lodging in his castle near adjoining: I told him it was a great courtesy at that time, yet I could not with my honour accept it, since I knew it would endanger him, my business to those parts being in favour of the religion, and the chief ministers of state in France being jealous of my holding intelligence with him; howbeit, if he would procure me lodging in the town, I should take it kindly; whereupon, sending his servants round about the town, he found at last, in the house of one of his tenants, a chamber, to which, when he had conducted me, and together gotten some little accommodation for myself and horses, I desired him to depart to his lodgings, he being then in a place which his enemies, the King's soldiers, had possessed. All which was not so silently carried, but that the said nobleman was accused afterwards at the French court, upon suspicion of holding correspondence with me, whereof it was my fortune to clear him.

¹ He was son of Anthoine de la Mothe-Arnauld, and although his father was a Protestant, there is no evidence to support Lord Herbert's statement that he himself was one.

Coming next day to Cognac, the Mareschal de St. Geran¹, my noble friend, privately met me, and said I was not in a place of surety there, as having offended Monsieur de Luynes, who was the King's favourite, desiring me withal to advise what I had to do : I told him I was in a place of surety where-soever I had my sword by my side, and that I intended to demand audience of the King ; which also being obtained, I found not so cold a reception as I thought to meet with, inso-much that I parted with his Majesty, to all outward appearance, in very good terms.

From hence returning to Paris shortly after, I found myself welcome to all those ministers of state there, and noblemen, who either envied the greatness, or loved not the insolencies of Monsieur de Luynes ; by whom also I was told, that the said Luynes had intended to send a brother of his into England with an embassy, the effect whereof should be chiefly to complain against me, and to obtain that I should be repealed² ; and that he intended to relate the passages betwixt us at St. Jean d'Angely in a much different manner from that I reported, and that he would charge me with giving the first offence. After thanks for this advertisement, I told them my relation of the business betwixt us, in the manner I delivered, was true, and that I would justify it with my sword ; at which they being nothing scandalized, wished me good fortune³.

The ambassador into England following shortly after, with

¹ Jean François de la Guiche, Comte de la Palisse and Mareschal de Saint Geran. He died in 1632.

² Lord Herbert is not quite accurate here. Luynes' brother was the Marquis de Cadnet. He had already visited England in January 1621, some months before Lord Herbert's quarrel with Luynes had assumed its final form ; he had soon afterwards returned to France, and did not repeat his visit to the English court. He endeavoured in vain to secure an English alliance with France, mainly in anticipation of the rising of the French Protestants. His insolent temper led him into some very curious quarrels, not only with the English courtiers, but with the permanent French ambassador in London, Comte de Tilliers. See Gardiner's Hist., iii, 389.

³ Howell thus mentions the author's recall : " Sir Edward Herbert is returned, having had some clashings and counterbluffs with the favourite Luynes, wherein he comporting himself gallantly". Familiar Letters, Book i, sect. 3, letter v. Chamberlain writes to Carleton under date 14th July 1621 : " Sir Edward Herbert is recalled thence for a huge train¹, in a sumptuous manner, and an accusation framed against me, I was sent for home, of which I was glad, my payment being so ill, that I was run far into debt with my merchants, who had assisted me now with £3,000 or £4,000 more than I was able at the present to discharge. Coming thus to court, the Duke of Buckingham, who was then my noble friend, informed me at large of the objections represented by the French ambassador: to which when I had made my defence in the manner above related, I added, that I was ready to make good all that I had said with my sword²; and shortly after, I did, in the presence of his Majesty and the Duke of Buckingham, humbly desire leave to send a trumpet to Monsieur de Luynes, to offer him the combat, upon terms that past betwixt us; which was not permitted, otherwise than that they would take my offer into consideration. Howsoever, notice being publicly taken of this my desire, much occasion of speech was given, every man that heard thereof much favouring me; but the Duke of Luynes' death following shortly after³, the business betwixt us was ended, and I commanded to return to my former charge in France. I did not yet presently go, as finding much difficulty to obtain the moneys due to me from the Exchequer, and therewith, as also by my own revenues, to satisfy my creditors in France. The Earl of Carlisle⁴ this while being employed Extraordinary challenging Luynes the favourite, and Sir Edward Sackville is to succeed him'. As a matter of fact, James Hay, Viscount Doucaster and Earl of Carlisle, temporarily took Herbert's place in Paris.

¹ Sieur Duuoulin came to England to make complaint against Lord Herbert in the summer of 1621. See Rémusat's La Vie de Lord Herbert, p. 83.

² The French ambassador in London, Comte de Tilliers, sent to M. de Puisieux, the French King's secretary of state, a despatch respecting this interview between Lord Herbert and James I. This despatch, which M. de Rémusat has printed in his Lord Herbert de Cherbury, p. 85, is dated 28th September 1621. It runs as follows:

De ce propos je suis entré en celui de M. Herbert, disant que j'avois entendu comme S. M. l'avoit reçu avec toutes sortes de faveurs et de courtoisies, et que même il se promettoit de retourner en France, que cela étoit bien contraire aux discours qu'il m'avoit tenus en ma dernière audience et aux demonstrations, de colère qu'il avoit témoignées contre le sieur Herbert, et même au désaveu qu'il avoit fait des inconsiderées paroles qu'il avoit dites à S. M. et à M. le connétable (i.e. Luynes), ce que j'avois fait savoir par delà. Sur quoi il m'a répliqué qu'étant roi il devoit retenir une oreille pour la justification comme pour ouïr les plaintes: ce que j'avois écrit en France étoit vrai, mais que ce qu'il avoit dit, c'avoit été sur le fondement que tout ce que j'avois proposé contre M. Herbert étoit vrai: mais que depuis, s'en étant voulu éclaircir, il avoit trouvé que les choses n'allant pas comme l'on m'en avoit instruit.

³ 21st December 1621, at Monheurt, of a fever contracted while he was leading an attack on the Protestants of Bearn.

⁴ James Hay, James I's first favourite at the English court, Viscount Doucaster and Earl of Carlisle (13th September 1622), Knight of the Garter and Master of the Great Wardrobe. He had lived in France in his youth, and had been ambassador there in 1616. He died 25th April 1636. Tilliers specially requested James I to send him to replace Herbert. Rémusat, p. 86.

Ambassador to France, brought home a confirmation of the passages betwixt Monsieur de Luynes and myself; Monsieur de Arnaud, who stood behind the hangings, as above related, having verified all I said, insomuch that the King my master was well satisfied of my truth.

Having by this time cleared all my debts, when demanding new instructions from the King my master, the Earl of Carlisle brought me this message, that his Majesty had that experience of my abilities and fidelity, that he would give me no instructions, but leave all things to my discretion, as knowing I would proceed with that circumspection, as I should be better able to discern, upon emergent occasions, what was fit to be done, than that I should need to attend directions from hence, which besides that they would be slow, might perchance be not so proper, or correspondent to the conjuncture of the great affairs then in agitation, both in France and Germany, and other parts of Christendom, and that these things, therefore, must be left to my vigilance, prudence, and fidelity. Whereupon I told his Lordship, that I took this as a singular expression of the trust his Majesty reposed in me; howbeit, that I desired his Lordship to pardon me, if I said I had herein only received a greater power and latitude to err, and that I durst not trust my judgment so far as that I would presume to answer for all events, in such factious and turbulent times, and therefore again did humbly desire new instructions, which I promised punctually to follow. The Earl of Carlisle returning hereupon to the King, brought me yet no other answer back than that I formerly mentioned, and that his Majesty did so much confide in me, that he would limit me with no other instructions, but refer all to my discretion, promising together, that if matters proceeded not as well as might be wished, he would attribute the default to anything rather than to my not performing my duty.

Finding his Majesty thus resolved, I humbly took leave of him and my friends at court, and went to Monsieur Savage¹; when demanding of him new letters of credit, his answer was, he could not furnish me as he had before, there being no limited sum expressed there, but that I should have as much as I needed ; to which, though I answered that I had paid all, yet, as Monsieur Savage replied, that I had not paid it at the time agreed on, he said he could furnish me with a letter only for three thousand pounds, and nevertheless, that he was confident I should have more if I required it, which I found true, for I took up afterwards upon my credit there as much more, as made in the whole five or six thousand pounds.

¹ Locke writes to Carleton that Herbert was returning to Paris on 22d February 1621-2 (Cal. State Papers).

Coming thus to Paris, I found myself welcomed by all the principal persons, nobody that I found there being either offended with the passages betwixt me and Monsieur de Luynes, or that were sorry for his death, in which number the Queen's Majesty seemed the most eminent person, as one who long since had hated him : whereupon also, I cannot but remember this passage, that in an audience I had one day from the Queen, I demanded of her how far she would have assisted me with her good offices against Luynes ? She replied, that what cause soever she might have to hate him, either by reason or by force, they would have made her to be of his side ; to which I answered in Spanish, No ay fuerza por las a reynas—' There is no force for queens ', at which she smiled.

And now I began to proceed in all public affairs according to the liberty with which my master was pleased to honour me, confining myself to no rules but those of my own discretion. My negotiations in the meanwhile proving so successful, that during the remainder of my stay there, his Majesty received much satisfaction concerning my carriage, as finding I had preserved his honour and interest in all great affairs then emergent in France, Germany, and other parts of Christendom ; which work being of great concernment, I found the casier, that his Majesty's ambassadors and agents everywhere gave me perfect intelligence of all that happened within their precincts ; insomuch, that from Sir Henry Wotton, his Majesty's ambassador at Venice, who was a learned and witty gentleman, I received all the news of Italy ; as also from Sir Isaac Wake ¹, who did more particularly acquaint me with the business of Savoy, Valentina ², and Switzerland ; from Sir Francis Nether-sole ¹, his Majesty's agent in Germany, and more particularly with the united princes there, on the behalf of his son-in-law, the Palatine, or King of Bohemia, I received all the news of Germany; from Sir Dudley Carleton, his Majesty's ambassador in the Low Countries, I received intelligence concerning all the affairs of that state; and from Mr. William Trumbull, his Majesty's agent at Brussels, all the affairs on that side ²; and lastly, from Sir Walter Aston, his Majesty's ambassador in Spain ³, and after him, from the Earl of Bristol ⁴ and Lord Cottington ⁵, I had intelligence from the Spanish court: out of all whose relations being compared together, I found matter enough to direct my judgment in all public proceedings; besides, in Paris, I had the chief intelligence which came to either Monsieur de Langherac, the Low Country ambassador, or Monsieur Postek, agent for the united princes in Germany, and Signior Contarini, ambassador for Venice, and Signior Guiscardi my particular friend, agent for Mantua, and Monsieur Gucretin, agent for the Palatine, or King of Bohemia ⁶, and Monsieur Villers, for the Swiss, and Monsieur Ainarant, agent for Geneva, by whose means, upon the resultance of the several advertisements given me, I found what I had to do.

¹ A Fellow of Merton College, Oxford (1578), and Orator of the University (1604). He was at one time Sir Dudley Carleton's secretary ; in April 1619 made ambassador-extraordinary in Savoy and Piedmont, and ordinary ambassador in Switzerland and Italy. He was an accomplished scholar. A manuscript history by him of the Duchies of Montreux and Montferrat is in the Bodleian. He died in July 1632.

² The Valteline.

The wars in Germany were now hot, when several French gentlemen came to me for recommendations to the Queen of Bohemia, whose service they desired to advance, which also I performed as effectually as I could ⁷: howbeit, as after the battle of Prague, the Imperial side seemed wholly to prevail, these gentlemen had not the satisfaction expected ⁸. About

¹ He was succeeded by George Herbert in the public oratorship of Cambridge, 18th January 1619-20, and was one of the most chivalrous supporters of the Princess Elizabeth of the Palatinate. He repeatedly urged on James I the necessity of interfering in the German war on her behalf.

² In 1620 he was directed to protest and prevent, as far as he was able, the invasion of the Palatinate; but he met with little success in these negotiations, and was recalled in 1625.

³ From 1620-5; but the marriage negotiations were entrusted to John Digby, Earl of Bristol, in 1622-3. He was created Lord Ashton in the Scottish peerage in 1627; served in Spain again in 1638-9, and died 13th August 1639.

⁴ John Digby, afterwards Earl of Bristol, was thrice appointed ambassador in Spain, for brief periods between 1611 and 1621. He finally left the Spanish court in January 1623-4, after the marriage negotiation had come to grief. Cottington was often agent at Madrid in Digby's absence. See below.

⁵ See p. 128 note 1.

⁶ i.e. Frederick the Elector-Palatine.

⁷ Several letters concerning offers of aid made to Herbert in behalf of the Elector-Palatine are in the letter-book described below. Brit. Mus. MS. Addit., 7082.

⁸ By the battle of Prague (7th November 1619), the Elector-Palatine and his wife were absolutely ruined. A vivid account of their situation is given in their letters to James I, printed in Ellis' Letters, first ser., iii., 110-4.

this time, the Duke de Crouy, employed from Brussels to the French court, coming to see me, said, by way of rhodomontade, as though he would not speak of our isles, yet he saw all the rest of the world must bow under the Spaniard; to which I answered, God be thanked they are not yet come to that pass, or when they were, they had this yet to comfort them, that at worst they should be but the same which you are now; which speech of mine, being afterwards, I know not how, divulged, was much applauded by the French, as believing I intended that other countries should be put under the same severe government to which the Duke of Crouy, and those within the Spanish dominions, were subject.

It happened one day that the agent from Brussels, and ambassador from the Low Countries, came to see me, immediately one after the other, to whom I said familiarly, that I thought that the inhabitants of the parts of the seventeen provinces, which were under the Spaniards, might be compared to horses in a stable, which, as they were finely curried, dressed, and fed, so they were well ridden also, spurred, and galled; and that I thought the Low Country men were like to horses at grass, which, though they wanted so good keeping as the other had, yet might leap, kick, and fling, as much as they would; which freedom of mine displeased neither: or, if the Low Country ambassador did think I had spoken a little too sharply, I pleased him afterwards, when, continuing my discourse, I told him that the states of the United provinces had within a narrow room shut up so much warlike provision both by sea and land, and together demonstrated such courage upon all occasions, that it seemed they had more need of enemies than of friends, which compliment I found did please him.

About this time, the French being jealous that the King my master would match the Prince, his son, with the king of Spain's sister, and together relinquish his alliance with France, myself, who did endeavour nothing more than to hold all good intelligence betwixt the two crowns, had enough to do¹. The Count de Gondomar² passing now from Spain into England, came

¹ Lord Herbert had from the first encouraged the French court in its hopes of a marriage between Henrietta Maria and Prince Charles, and viewed with little favour, it would appear, the Spanish proposal of marriage. On 14th August 1620 he had written to James I that the French marriage would be highly acceptable to the French nation and that the religious difficulties could be readily surmounted.

² Diego Sarmiento de Acuna, Count de Gondomar, was Spanish ambassador in England from 1613 to 1618. He arrived in England again about 1619-20, and Herbert to see me at Paris about ten of the clock in the morning. When after some compliments, he told me that he was to go towards England the next morning, and that he desired my coach to accompany him out of town; I told him, after a free and merry manner, he should not have my coach, and that if he demanded it, it was not because he needed coaches, the Pope's nuntio, the Emperor's ambassador, the Duke of Bavaria's agent, and others, having coaches enough to furnish him, but because he would put a jealousy betwixt me and the French, as if I inclined more to the Spanish side than to theirs. Gondomar then looking merrily upon me, said, I will dine with you yet; I told him, by his good favour, he should not dine with me at that time, and that when I would entertain the ambassador of so great a King as his, it should not be upon my ordinary, but that I would make him a feast worthy of so great a person: howbeit, that he might see after what manner I lived, I desired some of my gentlemen to bring his gentlemen into the kitchen, where, after my usual manner, were three spits full of meat, divers pots of boiled meat, and an oven, with store of pies in it, and a dresser board, covered with all manner of good fowl, and some tarts, pans with tarts in them after the French manner; after which, being conducted to another room, they were showed a dozen or sixteen dishes of sweetmeats, all which was but the ordinary allowance for my table. The Spaniards returning now to Gondomar told him what good cheer they found, notwithstanding which, I told Gondomar again that I desired to be excused if I thought this dinner unworthy of him, and that when occasion were, I should entertain him after a much better manner. Gondomar hereupon coming near me, said, he esteemed me much, and that he meant only to put a trick upon me, which he found I had discovered, and that he thought that an Englishman had not known how to avoid handsomely a trick put upon him under show of civility; and that I ever should find him my friend, and would do me all the good offices he could in England, which also he really performed, as must have met him at Paris while on the journey. He was the chief negotiator of the Spanish marriage treaty, and left England in 1622 to complete it at the Spanish court. He never returned to this country, and died in 1625 at Boumel in Flanders. Although loathed by the London populace, his gaiety made him popular at court. He told a merry tale, read Shakespeare's plays, bought a first folio, and liked English wines. (See Howell's Letters, 1630, p. 1.) Middleton's Game at Chess, 1621, is a scathing satire upon him. (See Middleton's Works, ed. A. H. Bullen, vol. vii.) His portrait by Mytens is at Hampton Court.

the Duke of Lennox and the Earl of Pembroke confirmed to me; Gondomar saying to them, that I was a man fit for employment, and that he thought Englishmen, though otherwise able persons, knew not how to make a denial handsomely, which yet I had done.

This Gondomar being an able person, and dexterous in his negotiations, had so prevailed with King James, that his Majesty resolved to pursue his treaty with Spain, and for that purpose, to send his son Prince Charles in person to conclude the match, when, after some debate whether he should go in a public or private Manner, it was at last resolved, that he attended with the Marquis of Buckingham, and Sir Francis Cottington, his secretary ¹, and Endymion Porter ², and Mr. Grimes, gentleman of the horse to the Marquis, should pass in a disguised and private manner through France to Madrid; these five passing, though not without some difficulty, from Dover to Boulogne, where taking post horses, they came to Paris, and lodged at an inn in Rue St. Jacques, where it was advised amongst them whether they should send for me to attend them; after some dispute, it was concluded in the negative, since, as one there objected, if I came alone in the quality of a private person, I must go on foot through the streets; and because I was a person generally known, might be followed by some one or other, who would discover whither my private visit tended besides, that those in the inn must needs take notice of my coming in that manner; on the other side, if I came publicly with my usual train, the gentlemen with me must needs take notice of the Prince and Marquis of Buckingham, and consequently might divulge it, which was thought not to stand with the Prince's safety, who endeavoured to keep his journey as secret as possible; howbeit, the Prince spent the day following his arrival in seeing the French Court, and city of Paris, without that anybody did know his person, but a maid that had sold linnen heretofore in London, who seeing him pass by, said, certainly this is the Prince of Wales, but withal suffered him to hold his way, and presumed not to follow him : the next day after, they took post horses, and held their way towards Bayonne, a city frontier to Spain ¹.

¹ He came from Madrid, where he had acted as English agent, to be Charles's secretary, in 1622. He was created a baronet on 16th February 1623; became Lord Cottington soon after, being accredited ambassador to Spain in 1631. After fighting for Charles I, he went into exile with Charles II, and died at Valladolid in 1653, when the peerage became extinct.

² An intimate friend of Charles I and Buckingham, he was frequently engaged in diplomatic negotiations with Spain; but he is best known as a prominent leader of court society under Charles I, and a patron of literature, in which he occasionally dabbled himself.

The first notice that came to me was by one Andrews, a Scotchman, who, coming late the night preceding their departure, demanded whether I had seen the Prince ? when I demanding what Prince ? ' for ', said I, ' the Prince of Conde is yet in Italy ' ; he told me the Prince of Wales, which yet I could not believe easily, until with many oaths he affirmed the Prince was in France, and that he had charge to follow his Highness, desiring me in the meanwhile, on the part of the King my master, to serve his passage the best I could. This made me rise very early the next morning, and go to Monsieur Puisieux, Principal Secretary of State, to demand present audience ; Puisieux hereupon entreated me to stay an hour, since he was in bed, and had some earnest business to despatch for the King his master, as soon as he was ready ; I returned answer, that I could not stay a minute, and that I desired I might come to his bedside ; this made Puisieux rise and put on his gown only, and so came to the chamber, where I attended him. His first words to me were, ' I know your business as well as you ; your Prince is departed this morning post to Spain ' ; adding further, that I could demand nothing for the security of his passage, but it should be presently granted, concluding with these very words ; Vous serez servi au point nommé, or ' You shall be served in any particular you can name '. I told him that his free offer had prevented the request I intended to make, and that because he was so principal a minister of state, I doubted not but what he had so nobly promised, he would see punctually performed ; as for the security of his passage, that I did not see what I could demand more, than that he would suffer him quietly to hold his way, without sending after, or interrupting him. He replied, that the Prince should not be interrupted, though yet he could do no less than send to know what success the Prince had in his journey. I was no sooner returned out of his chamber, but I despatch a letter by post to the Prince, to desire him to make all the haste he could out of France, and not to treat with any of the religion in the way, since his being at Paris was known, and that though the French secretary had promised he should not be interrupted, yet that they would send after his Highness, and when he gave any occasion of suspicion, might perchance detain him. The Prince, after some examination at Bayonne (which the governor thereof did afterwards particularly relate to me, confessing that he did not know who the Prince was), held his way on to Madrid, where he and all his company safely arrived. Many of the nobility, and others of the English court, being now desirous to see the Prince, did pass through France to Spain, taking my house still in their way ¹, by whom I acquainted his Highness in Spain how much it grieved me that I had not seen his Highness when he was in Paris, which occasioned his Highness afterwards to write a letter to me, wholly with his own hand, and subscribe his name, your friend Charles, in which he did abundantly satisfy all the unkindness I might conceive on this occasion.

¹ The best account of this adventurous journey, which took place in February 1623-4, is given by Sir Henry Wotton, in his Short View of the Life and Death of the Duke of Buckingham, 1642.

I shall not enter into a narration of the passages occurring in the Spanish court, upon his Highness's arrival thither, though they were well known to me for the most part, by the information the French Queen was pleased to give me, who, among other things, told me that her sister ² did wish well unto the Prince. I had from her also, intelligence of certain messages sent from Spain to the Pope, and the Pope's messages to them; whereof, by her permission, I did afterwards inform his Highness. Many judgments were now made concerning the event which this treaty of marriage was likely to have; the Duke of Savoy said that the prince's journey thither was, Un tiro di quelli cavallieri antichi che andavano così per il mondo a diffare li incanti (that it was a trick of those ancient knights errant, who went up and down the world after that manner to undo enchantments): for as that Duke did believe that the Spaniard did intend finally to bestow her on the Imperial house, he conceived that he did only entertain the treaty with England, because he might avert the King my master from treating in any other place, and particularly in France, howbeit, by the intelligence I received in Paris, which I am confident was very good, I am assured the Spaniard meant really at that time, though how the match was broken, I list not here to relate, it being a more perplexed and secret business than I am willing to insert into the narration of my life¹.

¹ Mr. Mead writes to Sir Martin Stueville (14th March 1622-3) that besides the Lords Carlisle and Mountjoy who went to Paris to excuse to Louis XIII the unceremonious journey of the Prince of Wales through France, the Prince and his company were followed to Madrid by the Lords Audover, Vaughan, Kensington, and about two hundred persons more of nobles, knights, gentlemen, and others. Ellis's Orig. Letters, 1st ser., iii, 131.

² Maria, wife of Philip IV of Spain (see p. 105, n. 2).

New propositions being now made, and other counsels thereupon given, the Prince taking his leave of the Spanish court, came to St. Andrews in Spain, where, shipping himself, with his train, arrived safely at Portsmouth, about the beginning of October 1623; the news thereof being shortly brought into France, the Duke of Guise came to me, and said he found the Spaniards were not so able men as he thought, since they had neither married the Prince in their country, nor done anything to break his match elsewhere; I answered, that the Prince was more dexterous than that any secret practice of theirs could be put upon him; and as for violence, I thought the Spaniards durst not offer it.

The war against those of the religion continuing in France² Père Séguier, confessor to the King, made a sermon before his Majesty upon the text, 'That we should forgive our enemies', upon which argument, having said many good things, he at last distinguished forgiveness, and said, We were indeed to forgive our enemies, but not the enemies of God; such as were heretics, and particularly those of the religion; and that his Majesty, as the most Christian King, ought to extirpate them wheresoever they could be found. This particular being related to me, I thought fit to go to the Queen-mother without further ceremony, for she gave me leave to come to her chamber whensoever I would, without demanding audience, and to tell her, that though I did not usually intermeddle with matters handled within their pulpits, yet because Père Séguier, who had the charge of the King's conscience, had spoken so violently against those of the religion, that his doctrine was not limited only to France, but might extend itself in its consequences beyond the seas, even to the dominions of the King my master; I could not but think it very unreasonable, and the rather, that as her Majesty well knew that a treaty of marriage betwixt our Prince and the Princess her daughter, was now begun, for which reason I could do no less than humbly desire that such doctrines as these henceforth might be silenced, by some discreet admonition, she might please to give to Père Séguierend, or others that might speak to this purpose. The Queen, though she seemed very willing to hear me, yet handled the business so, that Père Séguierend was together informed who had made this complaint against him, whereupon also he was so distempered, that by one Monsieur Gaellac, a Provençal, his own countryman, he sent me this message; that he knew well who had accused him to her Majesty, and that he was sensible thereof; that he wished me to be assured, that wheresoever I was in the world, he would hinder my fortune. The answer I returned by Monsieur Gaellac was, That nothing in all France but a friar or a woman durst have sent me such a message.

¹ Lord Herbert's report on French public opinion as to the Prince's journey to and from Spain (dated 31st October 1623) is printed below.

² It is curious that Lord Herbert avoids all mention of Richelieu, who succeeded to power early in 1624, and at once embarked on his policy of a forcible suppression of Protestantism.

Shortly after this, coming again to the Queen-mother, I told her, that what I said concerning Père Séguierend, was spoken with a good intention, and that my words were now discovered to him in that manner, that he sent me a very affronting message, adding, after a merry fashion, these words, that I thought Séguierend so malicious, that his malice was beyond the malice of women: the Queen, being a little startled hereat, said, A moy femme, et parler ainsi?—‘To me a woman, and say so?’ I replied gently, Je parle a votre majesté comme reyne, et non pas comme femme—‘I speak to your Majesty as a queen, and not as a woman’, and so took my leave of her. What Père Séguierend did afterwards, in way of performing his threat, I know not; but sure I am, that had I been ambitious of worldly greatness, I might have often remembered his words, though, as I ever loved my book, and a private life, more than any busy preferments, I did frustrate and render vain his greatest power to hurt me.

My book, De veritate prout distinguitur à revelatione verisimili possibili, et à falso, having been begun by me in England, and formed there in all its principal parts, was about this time finished; all the spare hours which I could get from my visits and negotiations, being employed to perfect this work, which was no sooner done, but that I communicated it to Hugo Grotius, that great scholar, who having escaped his prison in the Low Countries, came into France¹, and was much welcomed by me and Monsieur Tilenus² also, one of the greatest scholars of his time, who, after they had perused it, and given it more commendations than is fit for me to repeat, exhorted me earnestly to print and publish it; howbeit, as the frame of my whole book was so different from any thing which had been written heretofore, I found I must either renounce the authority of all that had written formerly concerning the method of finding out truth, and consequently insist upon my own way, or hazard myself to a general censure, concerning the whole argument of my book; I must confess it did not a little animate me, that the two great persons above mentioned did so highly value it, yet as I knew it would meet with much opposition, I did consider whether it was not better for me a while to suppress it. Being thus doubtful in my chamber, one fair day in the summer, my casement being opened towards the south, the sun shining clear, and no wind stirring, I took my book, De Veritate, in my hand, and, kneeling on my knees, devoutly said these words:

'O thou eternal God, Author of the light which now shines upon me, and Giver of all inward illuminations, I do beseech Thee, of Thy infinite goodness, to pardon a greater request than a sinner ought to make; I am not satisfied enough whether I shall publish this Book, De Veritate; if it be for Thy glory, I beseech Thee give me some sign from heaven; if not, I shall suppress it.'

I had no sooner spoken these words, but a loud though yet

¹ The great Dutch international lawyer and philosopher. As a leader of the Arminian faction and friend of Barnavelt, he was imprisoned in Holland in 1619. Lord Herbert welcomed him to Paris on his release from prison with the lines:

Carcere dum carere vietus, Tenebrisque Tenebræ
Vinculis eum demum vincula soluta tibi
Prosilient mediâ tandem de mole, videris
Quidquid mortale est, deposuisse simul.

In the fine English play of Barnaveldt (1619), which Mr. A. H. Bullen recently discovered and printed for the first time in his Old Plays, vol. ii, Grotius is one of the characters. He had visited England in 1613.

² Born at Goldberg in Silesia, in 1563, he was for many years Professor of Theology at Sedan. At the request of James I he visited England, but was there suspected of heresy. He abandoned Calvinism for the doctrines of the Remonstrants. He was a voluminous theological writer, and the intimate friend of Grotius. He died at Paris in 1633. Among Lord Herbert's poems is one 'in answer to Tilenus, when I had that fatal defluxion in my hand:

Qui possim Phœbum successum credere? Laudes
Quum facit ut scribas, Docte Tilenè, meas.
Providus atque morum consulto surripit istam
Ut melius possem nunc superesse tuâ.

gentle noise came from the heavens, for it was like nothing on earth, which did so comfort and cheer me, that I took my petition as granted, and that I had the sign I demanded, whereupon also I resolved to print my book. This, how strange soever it may seem, I protest before the eternal God is true, neither am I any way superstitiously deceived herein, since I did not only clearly hear the noise, but in the serene sky that ever I saw, being without all cloud, did to my thinking see the place from whence it came ¹.

And now I sent my book to be printed in Paris, at my own cost and charges ², without suffering it to be divulged to others than to such as I thought might be worthy readers of it; though afterwards reprinting it in England, I not only dispersed it among the prime scholars of Europe, but was sent to not only from the nearest but furthest parts of Christendom, to desire the sight of my book, for which they promised anything I should desire by way of return; but hereof more amply in its place.

The treaty of a match with France continuing still, it was thought fit for the concluding thereof, that the Earl of Carlisle and the Earl of Holland should be sent Extraordinary Ambassadors to France.³

¹ This testimony to a special divine revelation strangely contrasts with the advanced views that Lord Herbert elsewhere advocates respecting the subject of Revelation. See Introduction.

² The first edition in Latin was published at Paris in 1621. A second edition was issued in Paris in 1636. A French translation appeared in Paris in 1639. The first London edition appeared in 1633; the second in 1659. The original draft of the treatise is among the Sloane MSS. (A 3957).

On the first leaf is written in Lord Herbert's autograph: Dilectiss: Fratri Ge. Herbert Lectiss: Amico Gul. Boswell. Hunc Librum suum commendatum voluit Ed. Herbert ea tege Vt. signid contra bonos mores vel quod Fidei vere Cathol. adversus expugnaret; Quo pacto Aeterna tandem fuerini cum luce potius Hanc lucem Saltem, viderit iste Liber. [This last line has been altered by the author's own hand to Luce sua saltem gaudeat iste Liber.] E. II. 15th December 1622. On the top of f. 2 is written, also in Herbert's hand: De Veritate prout distinguitur a revelatione, a verisimili a possibili et a falso; Ant. Ed: Herbert. The body of the treatise is in the ordinary clerk's hand of the period and is corrected throughout by the author. It is imperfect at the end, finishing with the words "Suorum sustinendam sufficiat" at p. 205 of the London Edition of 1633. (Dr. Edward Scott, formerly Keeper of MSS. at the British Museum, in The Athenaeum, 30th April 1898).

³ In May 1624, James Hay, Earl of Carlisle, and Henry Rich (created Lord Kensington in 1622, but not created Earl of Holland until 24th September 1624), arrived in Paris to negotiate the French marriage between Henrietta Maria and Prince Charles. Herbert returned to England on 24th July 1624, and 'hopes', says Chamberlain, writing to Carleton, 'to be Vice-chamberlain'. Sir Albertus Murtion succeeded him at Paris as ordinary ambassador. Herbert's letter of recall, dated 14th April 1624, is printed below.

A CONTINUATION OF THE LIFE

OF

EDWARD, LORD HERBERT

OF CHERBURY

FROM 1624 TO 1648

IN spite of his avowed indulgence in all the frivolous pleasures of the French capital, Herbert served his sovereign and his country faithfully during the five years that he was English Ambassador at Louis XIII's Court¹. His correspondence bears ample testimony to his self-denying industry. He set himself to estimate the political and social forces that dominated France during the period, and the record of his observations proves for the most part his energy and his discrimination². And Herbert had every reason to believe that his services were highly valued at home. James I was a punctilious master, but in spite of an occasional misunderstanding, which was removed as soon as it was expressed, James had treated his minister with real consideration. The curt letter of recall which reached Herbert in April 1624 was the first sign that he had fallen into disfavour. James I had found it good (so the note ran) to dismiss his Minister, and had directed the Earl of Carlisle and Lord Kensington to take his place³.

¹ I give here a detailed statement of the facts of Herbert's later life. More general comment is made in the Introduction.

² See Appendix vii.

³ The letter, dated 14th April, ran thus: 'JAMES R.—Trustie and well-beloved we grete you well. We having upon further deliberation found good to call you from that service you are now in, we have signified so much by our letters to that King, which we send you herewith to bee delivered unto him, for as we having employed thither with our commission our right trustie and well-beloved cousin and counsellor the Earle of Carlisle, and our right trustie and well-beloved the Lord Kensington, we doe require you to present them to that King at their first audience, and so to take your leave and returne unto us with what convenient speed you may'.—Powysland Club Collection, vi, 420.

The rest was silence, and Herbert subsequently professed himself unable to discover the cause that prompted the King to cast so marked a slur on his reputation. But the clue is really not far to seek.

It was not to obtain a suitable partner in marriage for his son Charles that James I had made his fruitless advances to Spain in 1623, and was about to make similar advances to France in 1624. The matrimonial alliance was a mere accident in the policy that he was in both cases pursuing. His foremost anxiety was, without engaging England in a Continental war, to protect his daughter Elizabeth and her husband, the Elector-Palatine, from the overwhelming onslaught of the Catholic princes of Germany. James was a passionate lover of peace; but if peace became impossible, he wished his battles fought by anybody rather than himself. And another sentiment now combined with his love of peace-at-any-price to force him into a crooked course of action. James I knew well enough that a straightforward war needed money, and that money implied an appeal to Parliament and a discussion of popular grievances. Such a prospect always alarmed him, and it was mainly to avert its realization that he flung himself upon the barren hope of transferring to the shoulders of another nation his own responsibility in the German strife. He believed it practicable to introduce into a marriage treaty with a great Continental power (be it Spain or France) a clause pledging his new ally to intervene in behalf of his son-in-law, and of his son-in-law's allies the Protestant princes of Germany. When, therefore, Spain rejected the proposal, he coolly handed it on to France.

Herbert, his representative in Paris, saw at once the fatuity of the scheme, and he spoke out. Four years before, it is true, he had hinted that a marriage of the Princess Henrietta with the Prince of Wales might be acceptable to the French nation, and that the religious obstacles were not insuperable. The suggestion had then taken James I by surprise, and no one had paid much attention to it. But the situation in 1624 differed materially from that in 1620. Then Herbert was instructed to do all in his power to cement an alliance between the two countries, which offered equal advantages to each contracting party. Now England looked for a union in which her neighbour was to be saddled with whatever sacrifice the connection involved. French politicians, with all of whom Herbert was living on terms of intimacy, had not watched the tedious negotiation of Spain with England in the previous year without realizing this, and although the proposals were unattractive, French amour propre was not conciliated by the bestowal on France's rival, Spain, of the first opportunity of rejecting them. When, therefore, directed to open the discussion of terms with the French King, Herbert plainly told James that it would be necessary to bring Louis to some real and infallible proofs of his intention to aid in the recovery of the Elector-Palatine's territory before placing the matrimonial offer beyond recall. Herbert was not talking at random; he was merely interpreting one of many important pieces of information which had just reached him. Louis XIII was actually making proffers of friendship to the Elector's worst enemy, the Duke of Bavaria. But the English Ministers failed to recognize the significance of this fact, and Herbert resolved on his own account to give the opening discussion the advantage of frankness. He told the French statesmen that the negotiation with Bavaria must provoke a breach with England. The Frenchmen were annoyed by Herbert's freedom of speech; they addressed a remonstrance to the English sovereign; and James accepted the remonstrance in the spirit in which it was offered him. He had no taste for plain dealing; he had always placed his confidence in the most tortuous forms of diplomacy. The conduct of his Minister was as repugnant to him as to his enemies, and he dismissed him without delay¹. Thus Herbert suffered for doing no more than his duty—for showing a little more resolution and fixity of principle than was habitual either to him or to his contemporaries. Did he cherish any ill-will against James, the final result of the negotiation gave him ample satisfaction. Prince Charles and Princess Henrietta Maria were duly married, but France stirred neither hand nor foot to retrieve the cause of the Elector and the Princess Elizabeth.

Herbert was nearing middle age when he had first entered on a political career, but he had no wish to retire from it at the early age of forty-two. He would probably have lived a happier life had it been otherwise. He had native capacity that was fitted for higher purposes than contemporary diplomacy, and his memory would deserve greater honour had he yielded readily to the pressure of circumstance, and forsworn politics when the inducement to exert his abilities in their service was first removed. But he never looked very far ahead. He knew that at the moment the student's habits were not wholly to his liking; he preferred to find his recreation in literature and philosophy, and to make the handling of affairs the real business of life. Compromising imputations had been cast upon his name by his sudden recall, and these he was anxious to remove. His pecuniary resources had been, moreover, severely taxed; he was deep in debt to French merchants, who were importunate for payment; much of his salary remained unpaid, and he knew that, in spite of his numerous acquaintances at court, he needed the influence attaching to official position to press his claims on the attention of the Government. And there was certainly every reason for him to believe that his ambition in this direction would be gratified. Buckingham, the Prince of Wales, and other men of influence were his friends; from an early age he had been accustomed to receive marks of favour from the Crown itself. On his return home in July 1624, he therefore confidently awaited the offer of further political employment. But for six months he received only the vaguest promises. At length, on 30th December 1624, came a barren mark of royal approval, which gave its recipient very slender satisfaction. Herbert's wife had inherited the Irish estate of Castle-Island, Kerry, and in this fact James found a shadowy justification for creating Herbert, in reward of his five years' foreign service, my Lord of Castle-Island in the peerage of Ireland. Buckingham hinted that he might be able later to transform the peerage into an English honour, and on this assurance Herbert accepted it. With the cheap distinction went a grant of supporters to the ancient shield of his family, viz., a lion arg. powdered with roses of England, and a lion az. powdered with fleurs-de-lis of France'.¹ James I gave Herbert no other reward.

¹ Gardiner's History of England, v, 218.

The accession of Charles I inspired Lord Castle-Island with new hope, and as soon as the King was firmly seated on the throne he addressed himself to him in fairly outspoken language. His letter ran as follows:

¹ Powysland Collection, v, 165.

'MAY IT PLEASE YOUR MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTIE,—Havinge given my most faithfull attendance to your Majesties father of blessed memorie from the beginninge of his reigne to the latter ende, and in all that time havinge neyther demanded suite nor had any, your Majestie will easily knowe how small advantage I made of his service; yet, I must confesse, I was chosen Ambassador when I least thought of it. But as I lived in a more chargeable fashion than any before mee, and notwithstanding saved his Majestie a 1000^{li} yearly w^{ch} others spent him, and havinge withall done all marchant's business freely, weh never any other did in my place, I spent not only all the means I had from his Majestie, together w^{ch} my owne annuall rents, but somethinge above, so that still your Majestie may be pleas'd to consider mee as a looser. But yf the losse had bene only to my purse I could better have endured it, but it was (though w^{thout} my fault) in my name and estimation too, for when after the reconciliage of the distracted affections of this and that other people where I served, I hoped in this later treaty of marriage to bee admitted to the same honor w^{ch} was granted to St Thomas Edmonds in the former, I was not only excluded, but repeald, w^{ch} was the most publique disgrace that ever minister in my place did suffer; neyther have I anything to comfort mee, but your Majesties many gracious promises, both in your blessed father's time and sithence, the effect of w^{ch} I cannot doubt of, not only in regard of my many services and suffrings, but that no man in the memory of man ever return'd from the charge I had in that cuntrey that had not some place of honor and preferment given him. In the meane while I shall crave leave to present these my most humble suites: 1. That whereas his late Majestie made mee a Baron in Ireland, as in the way of beinge made a Baron of Englande (w^{ch} my L. Duke of Buckingham I assure myself well remembers), your Majestie would be graciously pleas'd to make good that promise. 2. Whereas all his late Majesties Ambassadors in France have at their returne bene sworne of the Privy Counseile, your good Majestie may be graciously pleas'd not to thinke mee lesse worthy that honor. 3. Whereas I am so farre from beinge payd that w^{ch} was promised by my privy seale, that I am not a saver yet by 3000^{li}, your good Majestie some way or other would recompense mee; and for the present to continue mee in your Counseile of Warre, both that I am the sole elder brother of my estate, who have bene on all occasions of that kind, since my minority untill my imployment in France (where I saw the seige of St Jean d'Angely and other memorable services); and also that I have done nothing in the warres for w^{ch} I have received publiq praise and thanks at the Counseile table here. I could adde other services, and doubt not but your Majestie may bee pleas'd to thinke on some, but howsoever shall submitt all to your Majestie, as my good kinge and master, who at length may be pleas'd to give a gracious conclusion to all my troubles, which I shall strive to approve myselfe, ever, and to all tryalles, your most excellent Majesties most obedient, most faithfull, and most affectionate subject and servant,

'May 8 1626'

E. HERBERT¹.

¹ This letter, discovered by Mr. E. P. Shirley among the papers of the Baroness North at Croxton, Oxfordshire, was first printed in Notes and Queries, 4th series, vol. x, p. 222.

Although Charles showed little more anxiety than his father to acknowledge Herbert's claim, and Buckingham was not in a position to enforce it, Herbert was not altogether overlooked. His anxiety to serve on the Council of War was a modest ambition, and with some modification it was satisfied. On 12th December 1626 he joined his kinsman the Earl of Pembroke, his friend Viscount Wimbledon, who, as Sir Edward Cecil, had been his commander in the Low Countries, and many other courtiers, on a commission to inquire into abuses in the state of the navy. But he still lacked more substantial satisfaction. Unfortunately, in March 1627 the French merchants to whom Herbert was in debt grew more importunate than before, and appealed to the English Treasury to force Herbert to pay them £2,000. Three months later (21st July 1627) he received very slight compensation for yielding to this demand in the joint grant of the manor of Ribbesford and other land in Worcestershire, to himself, his brother George, and another; but he did not long retain his share in the property, which ultimately passed to his brother Henry. The succeeding twenty months saw Herbert waiting helplessly for a more decided change of fortune. He was not invited to take part in the expedition to the Isle of Rhé in 1627, although many of his friends accompanied Buckingham in that unlucky enterprise; and the murder of the favourite in the following year (23d August 1628) further depressed his prospects. Meanwhile performances were lavished on Herbert's relatives and friends with no sparing hand, and he began to realize that he was playing a losing game. A cousin William was elevated to the English peerage as Baron Powis of Powis Castle, Montgomeryshire, on 2nd April 1629. The news was not very welcome to him. 'Lord Castle-Island', wrote one Philip Mainwaring of the effect the announcement produced upon him, 'has run into a nutshell, and will never appear again'. None the less in 1629 Charles gave effect to Buckingham's former assurance that Herbert's admission to the Irish peerage was only the prelude to his admission to the English peerage; and on 7th May in that year Baron Castle-Island became Baron Herbert of Cherbury. Three years later (27th June 1632) he took his long-sought-for place on the Council of War, and helped to draw up 'fit instructions for persons in command of garrisons and forts.' He was reinstated in this position on 29th May 1637; but this petty employment practically brought Herbert's official life to a close¹.

Humiliating to his self-esteem as was his inability to obtain a responsible political office by ordinary agencies and by appeals to his former official work, Herbert had too versatile a capacity to submit quietly to the failure of ordinary efforts. If success were attainable by less dignified methods than those he had already tried and tried in vain, he claimed no superior political virtue over his contemporaries, and was ready to give the less dignified methods a trial. He argued, with Bacon, that the architect of his own fortunes must make his 'mind pliant and obedient to occasion'.

Buckingham, on his return from the Isle of Rhé in 1627, had drawn up 'certain commentaries (hastily written)' concerning his conduct of the expedition. His enemies had charged him with gross mismanagement throughout his command, and with personal cowardice. A vindication was necessary, and he handed his notes over to Lord Herbert, who was importunate for the honour of retrieving his patron's reputation, and saw in the endeavour a means of increasing his own influence at Court. But the task proved a difficult one, and the Duke died 'his nefarious death by the hand of an assassin' before it was little more than begun. Buckingham's death, however, was the signal for some attacks of exceptional ferocity upon his life and character in both France and England. A Frenchman named Isnard and a Jesuit named Monat both published detailed accounts of his conduct² at Rochelle, and their libels led Herbert to abandon a momentary intention of sacrificing Buckingham's notes to 'privacy and silence'. At Montgomery Castle, on 10th August 1630, he completed the defence of his friend, and he dedicated the manuscript to Charles I. Herbert approached his sovereign deferentially: he applauded his 'innate and implanted gentleness,' and he apologized for his own incapacity as a writer. 'It is not, indeed, as I could wish, polished and set forth: the rough and unmusical kind of stile admits not the ornaments of words'. It must, in all fairness, be confessed that the vindication is a lame affair. On the last page Herbert arrives at a very halting conclusion: 'If it be granted that the French did triumph over the vanquished, it must not be denied but the English triumphed even over the victory itself, which, consequently, if they did not make use of and pursue according to the time and occasion, that the night coming on, and defect of horse were the only obstacles'. Sir Henry Wotton professed to admire the book¹, but Charles showed a shrewder judgment in declining to flatter either it or its author. Herbert apparently expected a fee for the performance, but the fee never came, and the writer was vainly reminding Secretary Windebank of the charges to which he had been put by the composition of the pamphlet eight years later. Herbert had it translated into Latin by a lawyer named Timothy Baldwin, but wisely took no steps to put either the English or the Latin version into print².

¹ The authority for the statements made in this paragraph is the Calendar of State Papers for the years 1626-37. The exact dates, given in each case, will indicate the volumes whence they are derived.

² The works which (Herbert asserts) called for refutation are: (1) Arcis Sannmarlianæ Obsidis et Fuga Anglorum a Rea Insula Scripta Jacobo Isnard, Paris, 1629; (2) Trezeisme Tome du Mercurre Francois, Paris, 1627-28; and (3) Capla Rupecula Gracina Servata auspiciis ac ductu . . . Ludovici XIII.: descripta utraque a P. Philiberto Monato da Societate Jesu Leclieu, 1630.

This failure, however, did not daunt Lord Herbert. If he could not gain royal recognition as the historian of the present, he would command it as the historian of the past. As early as 1632 he was engaged on his elaborate history of the reign of Henry VIII; in February 1639 he stated that he had already spent seven years in the undertaking. On 11th November 1633 he reminded Charles through Secretary Windebank that he had now served in Court 'without that ever he asked or got anything of benefit or value for above thirty years',—a statement which seems somewhat open to exception. He therefore prayed, in the first place, that further official powers over the manor of Cherbury, which 'he conceived to be his right', might be acknowledged by the Crown, and he made a second unspecified request, admitted to be 'wholly in His Majesty's good pleasure'. This request is proved by other evidence to have been an appeal for pecuniary assistance in preparing his great historical treatise¹. In a later petition (10th January 1634-5) he sought payment of £600, a fraction of his arrears of salary as French Ambassador, in the interests of the same work. His earlier request, he stated, had been answered by the grant of apartments in the royal palace at Richmond, but he found the situation inconvenient, and he now begged permission to remove to Whitehall, or rather to St. James's, 'whereby he might have access to the paper chamber of the one, and the library of the other house'.

¹ Cf. Reliquiae Wottonianae, 1685, p. 226. * This action, as I hear, hath been delivered by a noble gentleman of much learning and active spirits, himself the fitter to do it right; which in truth it greatly wanted, having found more honourable censure, even from some of the French writers than it had generally amongst ourselves at home. Now, because the said book is not yet flowing into the light, I will but sweep the way with a few notes'.

² The Latin version was published by Baldwin in 1658 after Herbert's death. The English version remained in MS. GH 1860, when it was first printed by the Earl of Powis for the Philobiblon Society. The date of the completion of the work given above appears only in the Latin version, which differs in several small particulars from its original.

But Herbert still stood in need of something more. His craving for an unequivocal public testimony of the King's favour had not been satisfied, and the mental distraction which his new labours brought him had not abated its intensity. In applying himself to historical investigations he allowed that he was following the example of two distinguished statesmen, and the result could bring no loss of honour. Sir Thomas More was the author of a life of Richard III, and Bacon the author of a life of Henry VII; but although both were 'great personages', he desired to be distinguished 'from those who before had taken pains in this kind'. More and Bacon wrote their histories, he reminded Charles, 'in the time of their disgrace, and when otherwise they were disabled to appear.' Herbert was differently situated; and it was, he urged, the King's business to avert any popular misconception on the subject².

Charles was deaf to these new entreaties. But Herbert energetically continued the campaign. On 14th May of the same year (1635) he drew up a paper of observations on the royal supremacy in the Church. He discussed Old Testament history, and showed the inconveniences and unscriptural character of a supremacy 'invested in a far remote and obnoxious prelate, who may sometimes want the power, and sometimes the means of giving that order which is requisite³. He therefore argued that a powerful king should alone be head of the Church. Herbert did not merit any advantage from this very imperfect and servile version of his own theological opinions, and the King did him a deservedly ill service by forwarding it some months later to Archbishop Laud, with whom the writer had previously maintained a formal intimacy¹. A month or two later, Herbert, who still hung about Court, dissembled the same subject with another authority, Panzani, the Papal Envoy, and took up a very different line of argument. His fellow courtiers were showing Panzani much attention at the time, and Herbert deemed it prudent to conciliate the men of influence with a courteous bearing towards their protégé. He was, of course, full of his history of Henry VIII, and he told the Catholic priest that the hero of his book really deserved to have little that was good written of him, and that, so far from upholding the rights of a secular ruler over a church, he intended to show as much favour as was possible to the theories of the Papacy. Anxious to obtain recognition as an author in any quarter, he went so far as to offer to submit his philosophical treatise De Veritate to the Pope's criticism². Vain yearning for applause doubtless moved him to make the offer: he did not intend his behaviour to cloak any very subtle design. But Panzani thought Herbert's remarks of sufficient significance to transmit them to the Holy See.

¹ Calendar of State Papers, 11th November 1633.

² Calendar of State Papers, 17th January 1634-5.

³ Two copies of this tract remain in manuscript—one in the State Paper Office (Cal. State Papers, 14th May 1635), and the other in the Library of Queen's College, Oxford (clvii. 158-79).

Unbaffled still, Herbert returned to the direct attack on the Crown on 9th February 1638-9. The scandalous delay of the Treasury in paying him his arrears of salary was growing more and more embarrassing. His son Edward had lived riotously and was heavily in debt, and he had impoverished himself in compounding with the young man's creditors. Moreover, Herbert was sparing himself no expense in collecting materials for his history—a work which he honestly deemed, in spite of ulterior personal aims, to be of royal, if not national interest. And the time seemed to him more opportune than ever for pressing his demand for recompense and recognition. Charles was in the presence of a difficult crisis. No one probably saw distinctly the road that events were taking, but the existing troubles with Scotland, which proved the prelude to the civil war in England, impressed Charles and his advisers with the necessity of closing up their own ranks, of conciliating their own supporters, and of presenting a compact front to their enemies, on whatever side they might threaten attack. He had taken the first step in this policy by levying troops for a military demonstration in Scotland, and by accusing the Scotch in a royal proclamation of attempting the overthrow of the monarchy under colour of a religious agitation. To lend support to the cause of monarchy, Charles summoned Herbert with his fellow-peers to York. It was therefore only just, Herbert argued, that the Crown, before throwing upon him new expenses, should cease to be his debtor, and he wrote to Windebank in a very sanguine strain on the subject :

¹ In Laud's correspondence with Strafford is the following passage: 'Another suit I am to make unto you at the request of Mr. Herbert, my counsel at law (i.e. Sir Edward Herbert, the lawyer). And your lordship I know will grant it me. Richard Herbert, eldest son of the Lord Cherbury, is heir by his mother to certain lands in Ireland, formerly the possessions of the Earl of Desmond. My suit is that if the young gentleman come over to you at spring, you will take notice of him, and let him know I have desired so much (Laud's Works, vii, 124).

² Gardiner's History, ix, 137-8.

'Having (he says) attended, since my return in 1624, some recompense through his Majesty's goodness for extraordinary expenses of about £5300 upon occasion of my embassy there, £2500 whereof rest due to me upon my privy seal (as I made it appear to the late Lord Treasurer and am ready to show to this), you may easily collect how much I have suffered these many years without presuming to trouble his Majesty with any large complaint, as hoping indeed his Majesty would before this time have bestowed on me such honourable place as my predecessors in that employment have enjoyed, as I desire to be represented to his Majesty, not forgetting to inform him how much this reflects upon my reputation. Besides which, my charges for writing the expedition to the Isle of Rhé in Latin and English, as also my keeping scholars and clerks for copying records and making transcripts of the history of Henry VIII., having caused for these last seven years divers new expenses, and having paid the debts of an unthrifty son, you see how many ways I am disabled from bringing the equipage I desire to the rendezvous at York'.

Herbert proceeds to express the hope that he may advance his Majesty's cause by taking a command 'convenable to my experience, former charge, and present quality', in the Scotch war, but he reminds Charles that he is prosecuting lawsuits in both Ireland and England, and that his absence may cost him dear. He therefore urges in conclusion that, should he not put in an immediate appearance at York, his delay must not be misconstrued¹.

The terms of this appeal were not likely to give it signal success, and probably did not secure its writer a very warm welcome when he joined his sovereign in the North. It proved that Herbert had lived too long on the outskirts of the political world to command much political foresight. He failed to see that Charles's difficulties were increasing with such velocity that merely personal grievances were incapable of redress in a crisis like the present. We do not know the duties assigned Herbert in the fruitless expedition of 1639, which never reached actual hostilities. The only trace of the episode left on his writings is a characteristically abstract poem entitled *The Idea made of Alnwick in his [i.e. the author's] Expedition to Scotland with the army, 1639*¹. The strains are too thoughtful to suggest that Herbert was in a mood to lend much effective military aid to the royal forces.

¹ Calendar of State Papers, 9th February 1638-9.

In 1640 the relations between King and Commons entered a far more critical stage. The short Parliament was hastily dissolved (5th May), and Charles summoned a council of peers at York to discuss the situation. For the moment Herbert forgot his grievances, for a second time joined the King in the North, and took his place in the Council (24th September). The immediate question under debate was whether or no an armistice should be arranged with the Scotch, who had now invaded the northern counties. Herbert argued (6th October 1640) in the negative. In spite of his years and his long lack of active service, in theory his martial ardour had not cooled, and he advised Charles to continue the war at all hazards². The Scots demanded the payment of £40,000 as the first step towards a treaty of peace. 'Treaties', said Lord Herbert, 'are thin airy things', and could never be worth so large a sum of money. No prince 'had ever bought a treaty of his subjects at so dear a rate', and it 'would reflect upon the honour of his Majesty abroad when foreign nations should hear of such an affront given to his Majesty and his kingdom'. But Herbert's advice was rejected and the temporary treaty of Ripon signed. Thereupon Herbert took what proved to be his last farewell of his sovereign, and at once withdrew to Montgomery. He was not over-pleased with the result of this new excursion into politics. He recognized that younger men were the prime movers in contemporary affairs, and that his name was practically unknown among them. The friends of his youth were no longer in the King's council. His kinsman, William Herbert, the well-known Earl of Pembroke, had died in 1630, Lord Wimbledon in 1638, and Sir Thomas Lucy in 1640. His health, moreover, was beginning to break, and his physicians recommended unexciting pursuits. Through 1641 and a great part of 1642 Herbert therefore passed his time with his books, began continuations of his philosophical treatise De Veritate and planned his autobiography and a work on education. He was clearly hesitating even then as to the rôle he should play in the coming struggle. His hopes that the King would redress his personal grievance were growing fainter and fainter.

¹ Poems, edited by J. Churton Collins, pp. 109-13.

² Gardiner's History, ix, 212. Rushworth reports the speech in his Historical Collections, ii, 1293.

The desperate aspect of affairs in May 1642 recalled him to London to study the situation from the nearest points of view. He attended the sittings of the House of Lords. When, on 20th May, the Commons resolved that the King transgressed his oath if he made war, Herbert spoke with cautious hesitation, and thought to sail with the wind. He promised to vote for the resolution if he could assure himself that the King made war 'without cause'. This qualification was ill interpreted by the Commons: he was committed by them for a few days to the Tower, and was only released on making a very handsome apology. The experience was not a satisfactory one¹, and Herbert appears to have contemplated retiring to the Continent. He, however, withdrew once more to Montgomery, which he doubtless deemed a safe distance from which to watch events.

It goes without saying that Herbert had mental resources outside politics which ought to have enabled him to take his political disappointments platonically, but until very late in life he would never allow himself to recognize the fact distinctly. Readers of other portions of this work will find illustration of his devotion at this and all other times to science, mechanical inventions and the culture of horses, to history, philosophy, and poetry. But whenever he allowed his mind to dwell upon the habitual neglect to which the politicians subjected him, he was tormented by consciousness of failure. And besides failing health and loss of friends, he had domestic troubles to harass him. His wife died on 29th October 1634, and was laid to rest in Montgomery Church on the following day¹. One of his sons was a spendthrift. All his brothers were dead before 1640, except Sir Henry, to whom he pathetically wrote in 1643, 'And here I must remember that of all of us there remains but I and you to brother it'. Everything contributed to benumb his political enthusiasm. Montgomery Castle seems alone to have preserved its attractions for him; there he was forced back on the happier memories of his early life, and his neighbours treated him with respect². Since political honour was denied him, he set a higher value than of old on his personal comfort, and he soon resolved to make that the chief plank in his political platform.

¹ See Lords' Journal, v, 77, and Historical MSS. Commission Report, v, 24. According to the Commons' Journal, ii, 554, Herbert was ready to advance money to the Parliament (cf. Hist. MSS. Com. Rep., v, 21). It is very necessary, and very difficult, to distinguish in the various records of the civil war the various Herberts who took part in it. Lord Herbert of Cherbury has often been mistaken for Lord Herbert, the eldest son of the Earl of Worcester, who led the Royalists in South Wales.

The outbreak of the civil war in 1642 evidently perplexed him. He prayed for 'a good and speedy end to all these troubles'. He tried for a while to close his eyes to their serious import. Although he was not inclined to countenance a revolution, his loyalty (it was clear) would ill bear the severe strain of repeated menaces of his personal security. His sufferings at the hands of the Crown had weakened his regard for its present possessor. The warfare of political parties had never been any concern of his. All that he immediately aimed at now, therefore, was a pacific independence. He resolved, as long as it was practicable, to observe a strict neutrality in the coming struggle, and to wait on the result. He cared no longer for his country but for himself.

The presence of Charles and his nephew Prince Rupert in Chester and Shrewsbury in 1642 feverishly moved the people of North Wales, and did much to strengthen their Royalist predilections. Lord Herbert's eldest son, Richard, at once raised a troop of horse and a regiment of foot at his own expense, and joined the Royal forces at Shrewsbury. Throughout the war he fought valiantly against the Parliament, together with his brother Edward, and Edward his eldest son. But Lord Herbert held aloof from the popular excitement, although it combined with his other anxieties to cause him exceptional depression of spirits. 'I am thinking', he wrote to his brother Henry on 14th June 1643, 'of the journey to the Spa, but I doubt how I shall be able to go, my body being more infirm than to endure any labour. And let me assure you I find myself grown older in this one year than in fifty-nine years before; which, as it is true, I should be glad were known among the best of those to whom you go'.

¹ The entries are in the Montgomery parish register.

² We obtain a glimpse of Lord Herbert, or Lord Castle-Island (as he was often called after his accession to an English peerage), in the Chamberlain's accounts of the corporation of Shrewsbury in 1636. He visited the town and was feasted by the civic magistrates: '1636, November 22, spent on my Lord Castell Islande, four pottles claret, 5s. 4d. Two ditto sack, 4s. Two dozen fine cakes.'

Ten days later Herbert wrote again in a like strain to his brother. A slight dispute had arisen between them. Sir Henry apparently desired Lord Herbert to take charge of his horses and put them out to grass in Montgomery, while the midland counties, where his estates lay, continued in their disturbed state. Lord Herbert declined to accede to the request. The letter is of value as an indication of his growing depression, of his fretfulness, and of his resolute endeavours to blind himself to the strife that was now approaching Montgomery Castle very closely. It begins:

'SIR HENRY,—For the good offices you ever done me, I thank you. But why thereupon you should fall upon your old whetting, I marvel. I had rather for my part forget all unkind passages than remember them, so as to send you a forgiveness for them'.

'Good brother, use no more close repetitions; and now I grow old and infirm, do not add affliction and discomforts to your faithful loving brother,

'E. HERBERT'.

Two months later (25th August 1643) Lord Herbert began to feel personally the inconveniences of a civil war; but he confessed to no sentiment except one of resentment at the interference with his comfort. Sir William Brereton was pushing his Parliamentary successes in Cheshire to the Welsh border, and on 11th June 1643 Sir Thomas Middleton, of Chirk Castle, Denbighshire, was appointed by the Parliament Sergeant-Major-General of the six counties of North Wales. At first Middleton joined Brereton in consolidating his conquests in Shropshire and Cheshire, and they interrupted all communication between Montgomery Castle and Shrewsbury.

¹ The intervening passages run: 'If Richard Whittingham sent you word (as he told me) of the condition of the two parkes, you would take nothing unkindly, especially when I wished him to tell you that if you sent a gelding thither, he should be welcome. But here you may remember the old answer. If you will not take it unkindly that I denied you a courtesy, I will not take it unkindly that you asked it'.

'SIR HENRY' (Lord Herbert writes): 'though the messenger brought no letter from you to my self, yet because hee told me you were well, the welcome news thereof in these troublesome times invites me to congratulate it with you ¹.

'We are here almost in as great straits as if the warre were amongst us. Shrewsbury, which is our ordinary magazine, being exhausted of wine, vinegar, hops, paper, and pepper at four shillings the pound; and shortly a want of all commodities, that are not natives with us, will follow, the intercourse between us and London being interdicted.

'My dear and only brother, I wish you all health and happiness, and so rest, though much broken in my health.

'E. HERBERT'.

Lord Herbert sends in a postscript his 'kind remembrance to your lady and children' ².

Early in 1644 Charles had recourse to the feeble expedient of summoning what he termed a Parliament to Oxford. The meeting was scantily attended, and mainly resulted in the dispatch of a letter to the Earl of Essex, the Parliamentary general, asking him to persuade 'those whose confidence he possessed' to treat of peace. All present signed the letter, but although the name of Richard Herbert, Lord Herbert's son and heir, appears there, his own is absent. Lord Herbert had declined to make the journey to Oxford on the ground of ill-health, and his excuse had been accepted by the King. Up to this time the public had not suspected Herbert's loyalty. His name had Royalist associations, and the Parliament, which resented the contemptuous references made to it by the Royalist assembly at Oxford, identified him with his relatives. On 9th February 1643-4 a Parliamentary order was issued for the confiscation and sale of Herbert's property in London and elsewhere. Directions were not given, however, for the immediate execution of this order, and Lord Herbert made good use of the delay. The order opened his eyes to his personal insecurity, and the growing necessity of caution.

In February 1643-4 Prince Rupert, whose mother's misfortunes had in earlier years excited in Lord Herbert a chivalric devotion, visited Shrewsbury with a view to protecting North Wales from the attacks of Middleton, who had made a very formidable demonstration there a few months before. Lord Herbert was invited to lay suggestions before the Prince, but he was clear-sighted enough to see the danger of openly associating himself with the Royalist leader: he declined the offer, and demanded to be left at peace in his castle. He was well able, he said, to defend himself and his property with the help of his son, and he resented the proposal to introduce a Royalist garrison.

¹ The next sentence concerns the quarrel about the horses. It runs as follows: 'If it had pleased R. Wittingham to have told you that I had stoue horses in my lower parke, and no grass in my upper parke (as he told me he would), there had been no occasion for you to demand that I could not conveniently do; but if you send a gelding or two untill Michaelmas, they shall be received'.

² These letters to Sir Henry are printed in all the previous editions of the Autobiography.

'May it please your Highnes', he wrote (27th February 1643) 'having now continued for the space of above two yeares in soe bad a condition of health, that I have not beene able to attend his Majesty in person, or otherwise to endure much labour, I shall most humbly desire to bee excused to y^r Highnes if I attend not y^r Highnes in person at this tyme: I have taken the boldnes further to acquaint your Highnes that Mr. Sheriffe of this county hath sent mee word that y^r Highnes intends to send a garrison for defence of this castle; but because diverse of my sonnes souldiers are inquartered in ye towne, and that for the rest, betweene my servants and neighbours I am always able to put a sufficient garrison in this place, I shall humbly desire y^r Highnes either to leave niee to the defence of my owne house, or if y^r Highnes will have a garrison here, that they may bee inquartered in the towne of Montgomery wherein my castle stands (some few only excepted) which may be lodged in my outworks made to y^e castle. Of all which I humbly desire I may have the command, together with the nomination of such officers as are usnall for fifty or threescore men, who (with the helpe of my neighbours) will bee able to make good this place, and that good order may be taken not only for providing the souldiers with all necessaries, but for their constant pay; though yet by your Highnes good leave I conceive there will bee noe neede of a garrison as long as my sonnes souldiers remayne in this towne, soe that at least I hope y^r Highnes neede not hasten the sending a garrison hither'¹.

Prince Rupert quitted Shrewsbury for a fortnight in March 1644, and returned after relieving Newark. That victory gave the neighbouring Royalists new hopes, and the absence of Middleton in London relieved them of their worst fears. But Rupert was not very successful in his collection of men or money from North Wales, and on 9th April 1644 he forwarded a threatening letter to the gentlemen of Montgomeryshire².

¹ This letter is printed (I believe) for the first time from the British Museum MS., Addit., 18, 981, f. 67.

² The following papers are printed in the Powysland Collections, vol. x, p. 138, with the prefatory remark:

'The following letter and document are in the collection of the Rev. Dr. Raffles, now possessed by his son, Mr. T. Stanford Raffles of Liverpool. They show that the loyalty of Montgomeryshire, as well as other parts of Wales, was waning, and that it required the military rigour of the Prince to enforce the contributions.'

'GENTLEMEN,—I have thought fitt hereby to give you notice, since I finde the country

In the following month the Parliamentary Colonel Mitton successfully attacked Oswestry, and in June Prince Rupert removed to York. These diversions destroyed the Royalists' rising hopes, and their situation obviously grew more and more hazardous. Rupert's disastrous defeat at Marston Moor (2nd July) drove him back once again to the Welsh border to recruit his depleted force. He was closely watched by Breckton and Middleton, but he managed to reach either Chester or Shrewsbury in safety. Thence he reissued urgent appeals to all the gentry of North Wales, including Lord Herbert, but Lord Herbert still refused to bestir himself. On 23rd August 1644 he forwarded from his castle the following quaint epistle:

'May it please your most Excellent Highnes, I shall humbly crave leave to tell your Highnes that though I have the ambition to kisse your most valorous and princely hands, yet because I am newly entered into a course of physiq I do humbly desire to be excused for the presente, beseeching your Highnes nevertheless to hold mee in your former good opinion and favor ¹.

But an attitude of neutrality in a civil war must always prove impracticable at one period or another, and the time was fast approaching when Lord Herbert had to definitely choose a side. About the first day of September 1644, Sir Thomas Middleton, who was with Colonel Mitton at Oswestry, received orders from the Parliament to advance on Montgomeryshire. Although there is little to confirm the conjecture, the county was regarded in London as a stronghold of the Royalists, and it was deemed wise to intercept within it a Royalist convoy of powder which was passing from Bristol on so deficient in the performance of those condicions concerning the contributions of and by Montgomery, which you see willingly offered and agreed upon in their behalfe with my Commissioners at their being there with you at Welsh Pool, concerning that affaire, I am now resolved to raise and collect the contributions of that countrey after the same manner that I doe the contribution of Salop, which is by an imposition of sixpence in the pound by the moneth out of all men's estates, in which there can be no particularitie or excuse. And for your arrears of the contributions formerly granted, I shall verie speedilie send some troopes of horse to quarter upon that countrey till they are fullie payd and satisfied, which will be a thing that I intended not, had not the countrey forced me theretoe by a voluntary fayling on their parts. Thus, I rest, your friend,

ROBERT.

¹ Showsburye this ninth day of April 1644.

² 6 May 1644.—Warrant of Sheriff and Magistrates to the High Constables of the hundreds of the said county, touching the assessment of £1,500 to be levied therein for the King's service. The assessors are to appear at 10 a.m., on Friday the tenth inst., at the house of Richard Price of Glau Waren.

³ This letter, which has frequently been printed, has been transcribed from the British Museum MS., Add., 18, 981, f. 229.

its way to Chester and Liverpool. On 3rd September Middleton and his troops left Oswestry by night. They marched until morning continuously, and then having seized Newtown, advanced to Montgomery, 'though with much difficulty on account of the foulness of the roads and the breaking of the bridges by the enemy'¹. The town made no resistance, but the castle was strongly fortified, and was expected to show fight; Lord Herbert and his daughter Beatrice were, however, the only members of the family in residence there, and they were in no fighting humour. Middleton summoned Lord Herbert to surrender, and he showed at first a respectable hesitation in replying to the demand. A few days were given him in which to make his final decision. There were many inducements for him to adopt a conciliatory tone. He knew that all his property, would be confiscated, both in Montgomery and London, if he resolved on refusal. News had reached him that his books, which were his most valued possessions, were to be sold forthwith under an order of the Commons dated 30th August, and the proceeds handed to Lord Fairfax's army². But he had doubtless also learnt that a few days later the Parliamentary authorities had 'forborne the disposing of my lord's goods for one week longer till they heard of his behaviour touching the surrender of his castle'. This forbearance weighed with Lord Herbert, and after some parleying he determined to save his property at the expense of his honour³. Before 7th September he signed an agreement with Middleton's lieutenant, James Till, according to which he, his daughter, and his attendants, were to remain in safety in the castle as long as they pleased; his property was to remain untouched, and was to be re-delivered to him absolutely in time of peace. It was not very agreeable to Lord Herbert to consent to the provision that Sir Thomas Middleton with twenty soldiers should take up his residence there. But by a special stipulation none of the new residents were to enter Lord Herbert's

¹ Full particulars of these military movements are given in J. R. Phillipps's Civil War in Wales, i, pp. 247-8. Sir Thomas Middleton's letter to John Glyn detailing his action is printed in Hist. MSS. Report, vi, and in Archæologia Cambrensis (41st series), xii, 325.

² Commons' Journal, iii, 612.

³ Under date 5th September Middleton wrote to the House of Commons: 'I have sent to my Lord of Chelbury about the surrendering of the castle of Montgomery unto use for the Parliament's service: it is a place of great strength and importance: and have received a very good and satisfactory answer from him, the particulars whereof I shall make bold to certify you of.'—A Perfect Diurnall, No. 59, p. 469.

library or the two rooms adjoining it, and the owner of the castle was to be permitted to quit it at his pleasure¹. A few days later Lord Herbert sent a servant, James Heath, to London to draw the attention of the Parliament to his alleged patriotic

¹ The text is given in the Hist. MSS. Report, vi, 28. The date must have been earlier than that stated. The document runs as follows:

'1644, Sept. 24—The Coppie of the Articles of Agreem't betweene the Lord Cherbury and Seriant Maior Generall S'r Tho Myddleton touchinge the surrend'r uppe of Montgomery Castle.

'I, James Till, Gent, as Lieutenant Collonell of horse, do hereby, in the name of Sir Thomas Middleton, Knight, promise and undertake that noe violence shal bee offered to the p'son or goods of Edward Lord Herbert, or any p'son or p'sons within his castle of Montgomery; and that they shall have free liberty to goe out of the said castle, and carry away their goods and money whensoever they will; and that a good convoy shall bee granted for the safe doing thereof as farr as Coventry; and recommendations given to the officers there for the further conveying of the said persons and goods to London, if it bee required; and that in the meane while a true inventory shal bee taken of all the household stiffe used in the said castle, and of all the bookes, trunks, and writings in the said castle, and that all the horses and cattel in and about the said castle, and all p'visions of victualls, bread, wine, and beare, shall be employed for the use of the said Edward Lord Herbert and his family, and that noe money, silver, gould, or plate shal bee taken from the said Edward Lord Herbert or any of his family; and that the said castle, with all the goods, bookes, and armes of the said Edward Lord Herbert, shal bee restored and redelyvered to the said Edward Lord Herbert, if it please God to send peace, or the Parliament order it so to bee done. And that in the meane while the said Edward Lord Herbert, with his daughter and family, shall continue in or returne to the said castle as formerly they did, if they soe please; and that they shall carry into the said castle all provisions necessary for cloathing and diett. And it is further agreed that Sir Thomas Middleton shall signe and seale this accord or agreement, if the said Edward Lord Herbert shall require it; and shall also further and assist the halffs of the said Edward Lord Herbert in the leavyng of his rents, and also p'serve his woods and deere. Dated halfe an houre past twelue of the clocke at midnight on Thursday the fifth day of September, Anno D'ni 1644.

'And it is further agreed that as longe as the said Lord Herbert or his daughter continue in the said castle, there shall not excede the number of twenty p'sons or souldiers, vnsles some imminent danger appeares; and that noe trunks or doores under lockes and keyes shal bee broken open. And that if it happen that the said Lord Herbert at any time doe remove from the said castle, that the said Lord Herbert shall have halfe a dozen men servants w'thin the said castle to doe the business of the said Lord Herbert, and three or foure maides to attend his said daughter. And that if any thing may be required for the further satisfaction and contentment of the said Edward Lord Herbert, it shall bee lawfull hereafter to exp'line and add the same. JAMES TILL.

'Witnesses:

'Hugh Pryce,
Samuel More,
Edward Price.

Oliver Herbert,
Rowland Evans,
Daniel Edwards.

'Whereas there is a doubt that goods should be removed or carried away out of the Castle of Montgomery by Edward Lord Herbert. It is agreed that there shal bee lett w'thin the said castle six beds for souldiers, one suite of hangings in the dining roome of the new castle, as also one suite of hangings and furniture for a chamber w'thin the said castle, wherein S'r Tho. Middleton shall please to lodge, and one bed with furniture for a captain. And it is further agreed that there shall be noe person or persons enter into the library or study of the said Edward Lord Herbert, or the two next roomes or chambers adjoining to the said study or library, during the time of the absence of the said Edward Lord Herbert, or at any time other time. It is further agreed that the said Edward Lord Herbert shall remove and carry all his goods out of the said castle, except the beds and furniture before mentioned, when the said Edward Lord Herbert shall thinke fitt.

'I am content to stand to all the above specified agreements in every point.

'EDWARD HERBERT'.

action, and to secure his London property indubitably. 'His master', the servant said, 'went, with the leave of the House, to his castle of Montgomery for his health's sake, and there remained, rejecting all offers from Prince Rupert and others to join them in the execution of the array; and he has since preserved the peace in those parts, and assisted the well-affected from time to time; but was prevented by sickness from coming to London or disposing of his castle, which is of very great consequence and the key of Wales, and is now delivered up to the Parliament, as the accompanying papers will show'¹. Heath therefore prayed that the sale of his Lordship's goods in his town-house, and of a number of books which were in the petitioner's custody, might be stayed by order of the House. This request was not granted immediately, and some persons claimed leave to seize the goods. Lord Herbert therefore sent other representatives to protest that though his name might be 'faulty' (so many of his relatives held high rank among the Royalists), his person was not, and he requested that an inventory should be taken of his London property, which should be left in his house, upon security to be forthcoming if required. On 23rd September the threatened sequestration was 'discharged and taken off'² after Breckton's account of Herbert's conduct had been read to both Houses. Upon such terms Lord Herbert vainly imagined perfect peace was possible.

Having thus arrived at a settlement with those who had deemed themselves his enemies, he had now to reckon with those who had deemed themselves his friends. Lord Herbert had not only broken ties of long standing: he had dealt his Royalist neighbours a well-nigh deadly blow. He had put into Middleton's hands a fortress that was, as he himself rightly termed it, the key to North Wales. Sir Michael Ernely, the Royalist commander at Shrewsbury, perceived that no time must be lost if the position bartered away by 'the treacherous Lord Herbert' was to be retrieved. He at once collected a considerable force of horse and foot, and marched upon Montgomery. Middleton anticipated some such manœuvre, and hastened to the neighbouring towns and villages for provisions to enable his men in the castle and town to stand, if need were, a long siege. But Sir Michael's movements were too rapid for the Parliamentary general. The Royalists fell upon his force while near the town and utterly routed it. Middleton retired with his horse to Oswestry, and made his way to Cheshire and Lancashire to procure relief. His foot-soldiers under Colonel Mitton managed to re-enter Montgomery Castle. Ernely straightway laid siege to the town and castle; earthworks were hastily thrown up and trenches dug all round them. For ten days Lord Herbert and his neighbours suffered terrible distress, and their peril grew with every hour. Happily Middleton foresaw their critical situation and wasted no time. He urged Sir William Brereton in Cheshire and Sir John Meldrum in Lancashire to hurry with him to their rescue. Sir William Fairfax, coming from Yorkshire, was also ready to offer some assistance, and thus four detachments of troops, numbering about three thousand men in all, arrived before Montgomery on the 17th September. Meanwhile Sir Michael Ernely's force had been supplemented by one small army from Chester under Lord Byron, and another from Ludlow under Colonel Wodehouse, and the Royalists had acquired a large numerical superiority over their opponents. Both sides acknowledged the high importance of the issue of the impending conflict and carefully laid their plans for an engagement. At a council of the Parliamentary leaders held on the night of the 17th September, it was resolved to revictual the town and castle before taking the offensive. Next morning, therefore, a third part of the Parliamentary forces was told off to bring in provisions and forage. Lord Byron had, however, taken up a strong position on the mountain overlooking the castle; he perceived the foraging party leave the enemy's camp, and, with his customary precipitancy, resolved to open attack on the stationary force. His sudden onslaught met at first with complete success, but this success was not sustained. After a desperate hand-to-hand conflict, the Parliamentary generals gained a signal victory before nightfall. Lord Byron fled to Chester and Ernely to Shrewsbury. The victors' loss included Sir William Fairfax, who was fatally wounded, but it was slight compared with that of the enemy, and the prisoners taken by the Parliamentary forces were very numerous¹.

¹ This and the other documents referred to are printed in the Archæologia Cambrensis (4th series), xii, 324 et seq. They are there abstracted from the Historical MSS. Report vi, 27. The dates seem somewhat erratic, and it is clear that they are often made late than other facts warrant.

² Lords' Journal, vi, 712a; Commons' Journal, lii, 636.

Lord Herbert and his companions, who had anxiously watched the conflict from the castle, were thus relieved. The next step that it was to his worldly advantage to take was obvious. He had to make an unmistakable profession of allegiance to the Parliament. Now that his own safety was assured, he willingly left his castle at the mercy of Middleton, and accompanied Sir William Brereton to Oswestry. The occupation of his castle and its neighbourhood by a military force had, in spite of the terms he had previously made with Middleton, deprived him of his means of livelihood, and it was a thankless business to play proprietor any longer. On 27th September 1644 The Court Mercurie, a Parliamentary newspaper, announced: 'The Lord of Cherbury, late Governour of Montgomery Castle, with Sir John Price, who came in to Sir Thomas Middleton, are come as farr as Coventry, and intend for London and to offer their persons to the Parliament'. Well-nigh destitute, he made his way to London, and addressed (2nd November 1644) to the Parliament a petition for relief which closely resembles his former appeals to Charles I². He asserted that he had sustained his losses in the service of the Parliament; and he received a more consoling reply than that with which his sovereign had been wont to favour him. On 19th December the House of Commons instructed a committee to consider 'some way for his present maintenance and subsistence'³. Twenty pounds a week was assigned him on February 25, 1644-5, and no restrictions were set upon his liberty⁴.

From this time he made his London house, which was situated in Queen Street, near St. Giles', his only home⁵. Parted from almost all his old friends, he concentrated himself

¹ For a full account of the battle see Phillipp's Civil War in Wales, i, 238-9, and ii, 201-9. A very valuable collection of despatches by the commanders on both sides is given under the latter entry. The result was watched in London with intense interest; and, according to the London Post for 1st October 1644, public thanksgiving for the victory was held on the part of the Parliament in the City churches.

² See Hist. MSS. Com. Report, vi, 34 and 48, and Lords' Journal, vii, 241.

³ Commons' Journal, iii, 727. ⁴ Commons' Journal, iv, 62.

⁵ Lord Herbert frequently moved his London house. In his autobiography he speaks of living near the Old Exchange at one time, and at another in Blackfriars. On 11th November 1633 he dates a petition from his house in St. Bartholomew's. On 16th January 1637-8 he was living at Islington (see Cal. State Papers under date). He dated his last petition to Charles I in 1639 from 'my house at Hackney' (see Cal. State Papers, 9th February 1638-9). In the references to his London house in the Parliamentary journals during the Civil War the building is entitled Camden House.

upon literary work. He had not apparently the heart to take up again his autobiography at the point at which the clash of arms had interrupted it: it was left unfinished in 1644. But in 1645 he issued the elaborate appendix on fallacies to his treatise De Veritate, and published his work De Religione Gentilium. He gave the finishing touches to his History, and wrote a bombastic dedication addressed to the King whom he had deserted; but though he made all preparations for its publication, he was fortunate enough to die before giving to the world this final testimony to his insincerity. At the same time he corresponded with foreign scholars, among whom he still could claim the unblemished reputation of a philosopher, and in September 1647 went for a few weeks to Paris on a visit to Gassendi, the famous French philosopher, who had always appreciated his writings¹. But those final years of his life must have proved dark and dreary even to one of his sanguine temperament. However he may have accounted to himself for his recent actions, he must have learnt that he was commonly called by both friend and foe 'the treacherous Lord Herbert'; nor could he have wholly freed himself of an inward suspicion that he had renounced from sordid motives the chivalrous ideals of his youth. His sons, grandson, and brother had all suffered deeply in their sovereign's cause: they had refused to qualify themselves for a Parliamentary pension; heavy fines and sequestrations of property were their only rewards of loyalty; the terrible contrast between his condition and theirs must at times have disturbed even his portentous self-composure.

But to the end Herbert gave no outward sign of remorse. He had become a Parliament man in all outward show, and was contemplating taking office under the kingdom's new rulers. On 26th October 1646 an ordinance was issued appointing him steward of the duchy of Cornwall and warden of the Stannaries². But Herbert does not appear to have taken advantage of the appointment. On 25th March 1647 he pointed out to the House of Commons that he was excluded from Montgomery Castle, and petitioned for permission to appoint a governor of his own choosing. He promised to be responsible for the maintenance of the fortress in the Parliamentary cause, and his request was granted, although he does not appear to have put in a personal appearance at Montgomery ¹. A few weeks later (12th May) Herbert was called upon by the House of Lords to account for an assault made on the castle by a Royalist band of soldiers from Welshpool, to which his governor offered no resistance ². After his return from France in October, he was fined (9th November 1647) for absenting himself from the House of Lords, but the fine was remitted the next day on the ground of ill-health ³. His last appearance in the historical arena was in his accustomed character of petitioner for money. On 4th May 1648 he reminded his patrons 'that much of this money (i.e. his pension) is now in arrear'. If it was not to be continued throughout his lifetime, its payment ought, he urged, to be prolonged 'until he be satisfied for the losses he sustained for two years and three months, during which time he kept his castle until he submitted it unto the Parliament, which losses appear by good certificate to amount to divers thousand pounds' ⁴.

¹ In 1635 Herbert had sent a copy of his De Veritate to Gassendi through Diodati. In Gassendi's correspondence (Opera Omnia, iii, 411) occurs the passage that establishes the fact of Lord Herbert's visit to Paris: 'Cum me invisisset illustrissimus Baro postidie kalendas Septemb. 1647, et redditus sibi non fuisse meas litteras contestaretur'.

² Commons' Journal, iv, 704.

His death was now close at hand. On 1st August 1648 he deemed it prudent to make his will ⁵, and he there shows himself to unexpected advantage. He bore his two sons no ill-will for adhering to the faith which it did not become him to leave, and made generous provision for both of them: but he specially favoured his grandson Edward, the son of Richard, the heir to all the entailed estates in Wales. To young Edward he left all the household stuff, books, arms, and ammunition in Montgomery Castle, 'charging him upon my blessing neither to sell nor give away, nor so much as lend any of my said books and furniture', and only to allow his father the use of them, 'he putting in good surety to my executors for the using of them, with good husbandry and without spoil, and for returning of them . . . with safety and without diminution'. Bags of money kept by Lord Herbert in a trunk in his chamber, together with the plate of his London house, were appointed

¹ Commons' Journal, v, 125, 171, 564.

² Lords' Journal, ix, 186.

³ Ibid. ix, 515, 516.

⁴ Lords' Journal, x, 243; Archæologia Cambrænsis (4th ser.), xiii, 265.

⁵ This interesting document is very long. It opens with a statement of his religious belief. I have made a transcript of it from the copy in Somerset House, where it is numbered 'Essex 138'.

for Edward's 'education in some one of the universities, or in travel beyond the seas'. To his daughter Beatrice he left the plate remaining in Montgomery, and his clothes and furniture in Queen Street were to be sold for her benefit: to his granddaughters, Frances and Florence, young Edward's sisters, he bequeathed a diamond hatband to be converted into 'wearing jewels', and two bags of old gold. To his younger son, Captain Edward, the manor of Llyssin was left for life, with remainder to Edward the younger, besides sums of ready money in the hands of foreign merchants; but a quaint condition was annexed to this bequest. The legatee was to pay to 'two maimed soldiers that have done something that is famous in the service of the kingdom or of any confederate thereof in the wars, the sum of ten pounds a year yearly', and these men were to 'attend and wait with halberts in their right hands at the gate of my castle of Montgomery'. His Latin and Greek books which were with him in Queen Street were to pass to Jesus College, Oxford, 'for the inception of a library there'¹. Directions were given to his grandson to carry all his manuscripts and English books from London to Montgomery Castle. His autobiography was to be completed and published by 'a person whom I shall by word entreat'. Richard, the elder son, received his father's horses, with a special injunction 'to make much of the white horse', and the viols and lutes went to Richard's wife, Mary, daughter of John, Earl of Bridgwater. The final article in the document breathes a very quixotic generosity. 'Near the sum', says Herbert, of £2,000 is due to me from the Houses of Parliament as an arrears of £20 settled to be paid unto me weekly. And whereas by my capitulation with Sir Thomas Middleton, my losses and other damages—£12,000 and more—were all to be made good

¹ The original catalogue of this collection, consisting of twenty closely written folios, is still in the possession of the college. The books seem to have been in the keeping of Sir Henry Herbert at the date of his brother's death, and Selden, one of the executors of the will, had some difficulty in procuring their transference to the college. The following letter was sent by Selden to Sir Henry on the subject:

'Noble Sir,—This gentleman, Mr. Williams, comes from Dr. Munnell, head of Jesus College, in Oxford, about the legacy of books made to them by my Lord Herbert of Chirbury. I presume he will take just care of the safe delivery of them, if he shall receive them from your hand, which I desire he may, together with the catalogue, to take a copy of it, and return it again. Sir, I ever am,

'Your most affectionate and humble servant,

'J. SELDEN.

² November 1, 1648, White Friars.

³ The Hon. Sir HENRY HERBERT, Knight'.

unto me, I do hereby totally remit the same, desiring the said honourable Houses that, in leu thereof, and for my sake, that they will please to remit unto my said son, Colonel Richard Herbert, the sum of £2,500 imposed upon him as a fine for his delinquency by the committee sitting at Goldsmith's Hall'. Herbert concludes by entreating his three executors—his grandson Edward, and his friends John Selden and Evan Thomas of Bishop's Castle, Shropshire—to present a petition on this subject to Parliament in behalf of his son, 'whose great debts and numerous issue are a burthen greater than my weak state can well bear' ¹.

On 20th August 1648 Lord Herbert died at his house in Queen Street, nineteen days after his will was drafted. On his death-bed he sent for Usher, the Primate of Ireland, with whom he had previously lived on terms of intimacy. He asked to receive the sacrament at Usher's hand. It might do him some good, he added, and would do him no harm. But on such an understanding the Archbishop declined to comply with the dying man's request. Turning on his side, Lord Herbert solemnly announced that in an hour from that moment he should quit this world; and these, his last words, proved true ². By his will he directed that 'his earthly parts' should be committed to the earth at 'twelve of the clock at night in the parish church where I shall die, without pomp or other ceremony than is usual'. He forbade 'all mourning or shew of mourning, . . . desiring my friends nevertheless to love my memory'. These orders were faithfully fulfilled, and Lord Herbert's body was buried in the Church of St. Giles-in-the-Fields, beneath a stone bearing the inscription, believed to be from the pen of his friend Lord Stanhope: 'Hic inhumatur corpus Edwardi Herbert equitis Balnei, baronis de Cherbury et Castle-Island, auctoris libri, cui titulus est "De Veritate." Reddor ut herbæ; ³; vicesimo die Augusti anno Domini 1648'.

¹ The second Lord Herbert had four sons—Edward, John (died young), Henry Thomas; and four daughters—Frances, Florence, Arabella, and Alicia.

² Aubrey's Lives, ii, 387. Aubrey also writes that Lord Herbert 'had constantly prayers twice a day in his house, and on Sundays would have his chaplain read one of Smyth's sermons. . . . I have seen him several times with Sir John Danvers: he was a black man'.

³ Reddor ut herbæ was Herbert's own anagram on his surname and Christian name. Among his poems is the following Epitaphium in anagramma nominis sui:

Quas turgens flos mane decet, quas aruit omnes
Una dies, quas morte cita, nova vita sequetur,
Non unquam moritura tamen, sic Reddor ut Herbæ.

But this was not the only memorial which Lord Herbert desired. He had Hamlet's horror of a bad epitaph, and made every kind of provision to secure at any rate a neutral one. One Mr. Stone of Long Acre had received instructions from him in his lifetime to set up a monument either in Montgomery or Cherbury church, 'with a strong grate of iron . . . eight feet high, before it every way' and 'on the pedestal of the pillar which is to stand in the middle of the said monument' the following words were to be placed 'Quid aspectas, lector? non iacet ullibi Edwardus Baro Herbert de Cherbury et Castri Insulæ de Kerry sed meliori sui parte in beatorum sedes abiit seram posteritatem testatus nihil ita relictum nisi quod secum abducere noluit! Vale, lector, et stude eternitati'¹. If leave were obtained, Herbert did not object (he said in his will) to the erection to his memory of a little chapel at Montgomery 'adjacent to that . . . where my ancestors lie buried'. Among Herbert's poems appears one other epitaph for himself, and this one is written in his own language. It runs:

'READER,

'The Monument which thou beholdest here

Presents Edward, Lord Herbert, to thy sight;

A man, who was so free from either hope or fear,

To have or lose this ordinary light,

That when to elements his body turned were,

He knew that as those elements would fight,

So his immortal Soul should find above

With his Creator, Peace, Joy, Faith, and Love!²

But if Lord Herbert had little political influence in his own times, his name had less in the years that immediately followed his death. And the march of events deprived his sons and executors of all opportunity of carrying out his will; no monument was set up in Montgomery Church, as he had directed, nor was his landed property there distributed as he desired. Montgomery Castle had not passed through the late civil conflict without blemish; like all fortresses in private hands, it had been an object of suspicion to the new rulers of the country, and when it passed into the possession of an avowed Royalist like Lord Herbert's heir, it was doomed to immediate destruction. Its end came peacefully. Richard Herbert, who succeeded his father in his titles, was allowed to compound for his estates, but under a Parliamentary order dated 16th June 1649 was forced to consent to the demolition of Montgomery Castle¹. In the following months the ancient structure was levelled to the ground, and the owner was granted the barren privilege of employing his own wreckers, and of selling the scattered stones for his own profit. He gained, it is said, not a penny by the tantalizing transaction. He apparently retired to London, and there he died on 13th May 1655, while his enemies were still in power. But his friends were able to secure burial for him with his ancestors in Montgomery church. The old Lord Herbert's favourite grandchild, Edward, became the third Lord Herbert of Cherbury, and he lived to witness the restoration of the monarchy, in behalf of which he had loyally fought with his father throughout the civil war. He appears to have reciprocated his grandfather's affection. To him his grand-uncle, Sir Henry, dedicated the first Lord Herbert's poems when he printed them for the first time in 1665. Though twice married—first to a daughter of the very Sir Thomas Middleton who had caused his grandfather so much distress of mind and estate, and secondly to a granddaughter of his grandfather's early friend Lord Chandos—he had no children, and on his death on 9th December 1678 the title passed to his brother Henry. With the death (without issue) of Henry, the fourth Lord, on 21st April 1691, the united baronies of Herbert of Cherbury and of Castle-Island of Kerry became extinct².

¹ Lloyd in his Memoirs (ii, 340) gives the following account of this monument: 'He had designed a fair monument of his own invention, to be set up for him in the church of Montgomery, according to the model following: Upon the ground a hath-piece of 14 foot square, on the midst of which is placed a Doric column, with its right of pedestal basis, and capitols of 15 foot in height; on the capitol of the column is mounted an urn with a heart flambeau, supported by two angels. The foot of this column is attended with four angels, placed on pedestals at each corner of the said hath-piece; two having torches reverst, extinguishing the motto of mortality; the other two holding up palms, the emblems of victory'. The details which I quote are from Lord Herbert's will.

² Poems, ed J. Churton Collins, p. 81.

¹ Commons' Journal, vi, 228.

² Burke's Extinct Peerages, s. v. 'Herbert of Cherbury'. Three years later (28th April 1694) the single barony of Herbert of Cherbury was revived in favour of another Henry Herbert, the only son of Sir Henry Herbert who survived his eldest brother five and twenty years. But this was a transient revival. The first Lord Herbert of Cherbury of this new creation died in 1709, and his only son, the second lord, left no issue on his death in 1738 to inherit the barony. When the earldom of Powis was created in 1748, and restored in 1804, the barony of Herbert of Cherbury gave its name to one of the minor titles.

APPENDIX

APPENDIX

I

The early History of the Herbert Family

The Herbert family has a well-ascertained genealogy, but Lord Herbert has not exhausted the subject, nor is his account at all points to be relied on.¹

Dugdale, as I have noted above², received assistance in his treatment of the history of the Herberts in his Baronage from Lord Herbert himself, and, like Lord Herbert, makes no real endeavour to trace the pedigree beyond the William Herbert who was created Earl of Pembroke in 1468. In his corrections of the Baronage (printed in Collectanea Topographica et Genealogica, i, 219 et seq.), Dugdale threw out the conjecture that 'the common ancestor' of the family was chamberlain to King Stephen. But reference to the Domesday Survey (p. 48b.) really gives far more precise information. There we find that Herbertus Camerarius—one of the Conqueror's companions—held from the King two Hampshire manors, and that the Camerarius had a son, Henry Thesaurarius—who held the office of royal treasurer, not only under William I, but under his two successors, and was, like his father, a Hampshire tenant in capite (Domesday 49b). It has been frequently stated that Henry the Treasurer was a natural son of Henry I³, but his appearance in Domesday proves the absurdity of the statement. He was as old, if not older than Henry I. His father was alive as late as 1101⁴, and he himself died at a great age in Stephen's reign. Herbert Fitz-Herbert, his son, and therefore a grandson of William I's companion, held the office of chamberlain through Stephen's and Henry I's reign, and he, or his immediate successors, added

¹ The subject has long formed an attractive field of labour for Welsh antiquaries, and they have derived no little satisfaction from the fact that they have been able to supplement and correct the usually accurate results of Dugdale.

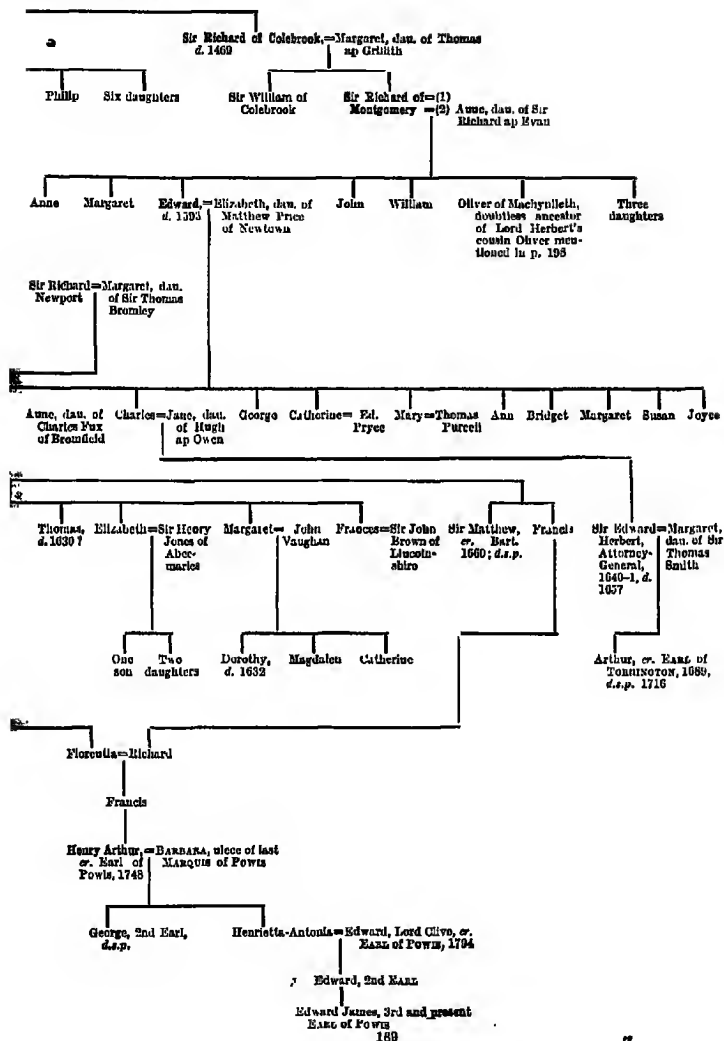

² See p. 2.

³ In 1462, when the first Earl of Pembroke was created a Knight of the Garter, the oldest heralds and bards of South Wales were directed to 'certify the lineage and stock of the said Earl', and in their anxiety to connect the family with the 'Royal blood of the Crown of England', they made the founder of the family 'son natural of King Henry the First'. See Dugdale, ii, 256.

⁴ Eyton's Shropshire, i, 244.

THE HERBERT FAMILY

Hedya, dau. and heiress of Sir David
Gamma, Knt., and widow of Sir Robert Vaughan, Knt.

estates in Yorkshire and Gloucestershire to the ancestral property in Hampshire. Herbert Fitz-Herbert's grandson, Peter, appears to have been the first of the family to secure land in Wales. When William de Braose was attainted in 1210, John granted to him the lordships of Blaenllyfni and Talgarth, together with the honour and castle of Dinas, Brecknockshire, and his successors were summoned to Parliament as lords of Blaenllyfni. Peter-Fitz-Reginald, the younger of two grandsons of Peter the first Welsh settler, identified himself with Wales. He died in 1323, having married Alice, heiress of the lord of Llanowell, Moumouthshire. Their son Herbert succeeded to this lordship, and married Margaret, heiress of the lordship of Llandwenin and Llandough; and Adam, this Herbert's son, married Christina, the heiress of a third great landowner of Monmouthshire (Gwillim Ddû of Wernddû). In the next three generations the chief representatives of the family pursued their ancestor's domestic policy, and by persistently marrying neighbouring heiresses, consolidated their territorial supremacy in south-east Wales. Beneath the Welsh nomenclature, which they gradually assumed, they concealed their English origin. Maud, the daughter and heiress of Sir John Morley, married Thomas ap Gwillim ap Jcnkin (who died in 1438), a great grandson of Adam Fitz-Herbert. She brought Raglan into the hands of the family, and was the grandmother of the two Herberts (the Earl of Pembroke and his brother Richard) whom Lord Herbert of Cherbury regarded as the founders of his family¹. These men—of the thirteenth generation in descent from Henry, the Conqueror's treasurer—appear to have been the first of the family to acquire reputation for anything beyond great wealth and territorial influence.

I have given sufficient information in my notes as to the genealogy of the succeeding generations of the younger branch of the family to which Lord Herbert belonged; the accompanying table will help the reader to realize the relations of the elder to the younger branch. It is well to bear in mind that of the two Herberts who fell at Hedgecote Field in 1469, the elder, William Earl of Pembroke, is the common ancestor (1) (by the marriage of his granddaughter Elizabeth) of the Earls and Marquises of Worcester of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, whose heirs bore the courtesy title of Lord Herbert²; (2) (through an illegitimate son) of the Earls of Pembroke (by a second creation) of the sixteenth and succeeding centuries¹; and (3) of the extinct Herbert family of St. Julian's, into which Lord Herbert of Chirbury married. (The modern earldom of Carnarvon was conferred on a son of the fifth son of the eighth Earl of Pembroke in 1793.) Richard Herbert, the younger brother of the fifteenth-century Earl of Pembroke, is the common ancestor of Edward Lord Herbert of Chirbury and his successors, and of the Earls of Powis of the latest creation (now represented by the fourth Earl). Thus three English earldoms (Pembroke, Carnarvon, and Powis) still remain in the family.

¹ It is seldom that a family pedigree is so clearly traceable as in the present instance. The subject has been treated in a very scholarly fashion by Mr. Joseph Morris in the Archæologia Cambrensis, 3rd series, vol. iv, pp. 16-30. A very deliberate attempt has been made to connect the founder of the family in England—the companion of William I.—with Charlemagne, but the links await verification. The first of the Ten Tables prefixed by Lord Powis to his edition of Lord Herbert's Expedition to the Isle of Rhé professes to supply this pedigree.

² Henry, third Marquis of Worcester, was created in 1682 Duke of Beaufort, and he is the ancestor of the eighth and present Duke.

II

Wales in the Sixteenth Century

Throughout the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries England was occupied in denationalizing Wales. Owen Glendower (Glyndwr) had made a desperate struggle to recover his country's independence in the early years of Henry IV's reign. His failure had been followed by a series of penal enactments which deprived Welshmen of all political or civic rights. Welsh customs were suppressed by law, and intermarriage of the Welsh and English was made a capital offence. But though the government of the country was nominally divided between the stewards of the royal domains under the Prince of Wales and the feudal landowners known as the Lord Marchers, it was practically in the latter's hands. The absence of a strong executive government combined with the new vexatious legislation to excite the people against their rulers more effectually than before; and the rudimentary condition of Welsh society at the time intensified the evils of divided authority in the executive government. The patriarchal theories of life still regulated social institutions, and the right of a man to rob his neighbour of his property, were he strong enough to do so, was generally recognized. Every family was thus united through all its branches into a band of brigands, who marched at frequent intervals from their mountain homes to make raids upon the border-chieftains. Occasionally they made war upon each other, but their native turbulence of spirit was for many years kept in check at home by the strong bond of hatred of their common oppressors. In 1478 an attempt was made to meet the difficulties of the situation by organizing a Council of Lords Marchers—a Welsh Star Chamber—with summary jurisdiction over the disturbers of the public peace. Its headquarters were fixed at Ludlow Castle, but the arrangement did not answer the expectations formed of it. The accession, with the assistance of many Welsh followers, of Henry VII, the grandson of a Welsh squire, to the English throne in 1485, led to the first improvement in the sentimental relations between the two peoples. But neither the political nor the social condition of Wales was thereby materially improved. As Lord Herbert points out in his History of Henry VIII, during the first years of the reign, 'in about some 141 Lordships marchers . . . many strange and discrepant customs' were still practised; and although he insists that his great-grandfather, Sir Richard Herbert¹, was a forcible administrator in a part of the Principality, he admits that 'the lords marchers (who conquered at their own cost) ruled yet by their own laws and customs, and substituted officers at their pleasure, who again committed such rapines as nothing about was safe or quiet'. And the national antipathy had not yet exhausted itself. The Minister Cromwell believed that 'in the trouble caused by the divorce' the Welsh were an element of weakness to England, and to illustrate England's power, he put to death Sir Rice ap Griffith in 1531, on the specious ground that he had countenanced a scheme for an invasion from Scotland in behalf of Queen Catherine, in which the Welsh were to support the invaders². In 1536 Parliament took the matter in hand. It was pointed out that 'manifold robberies, murders, and other malefacts' were daily practised throughout Wales and the Welsh marches, and that justice was not administered there as in other parts of the realm. It was therefore enacted, (1) that Wales should be incorporated with England by act of union; (2) that all Welshmen should enjoy the privileges of Englishmen; (3) that all English laws were to be observed in Wales; (4) that the English language was to be alone recognized as the official language of the people; (5) that the Welsh national customs still adhered to outside North Wales were to be examined into by a special commission with a view to their extirpation. Thus the independent jurisdiction of the lords marchers was annulled: the Council was not abolished, but its functions were more distinctly defined, and it was given the new title of the Court of the Council of Wales (1543)³. Steps were taken to form the territories of the marchers into counties. Monmouth became a new English shire, while Radnor, Brecknock, Montgomery, and Denbigh were formed into new Welsh shires. Justices of assize and sheriffs were nominated for the whole Principality, and it was expected that Welsh turbulence would straightway subside. But there were two serious defects in this legislation. The statute affecting the Welsh language excluded Welsh-speaking persons from political office, and the Court of Wales adopted arbitrary modes of judicial procedure which did little to conciliate a people which set a high value on individual liberty. Roland Lee, afterwards Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, entered on a vigorous administration of the office of President at this moment, and he resolved on forcible suppression of all lawless outrage. 'All the thieves in Wales', he wrote to Croinwell, 'quake for fear', and 'although', he said in another letter, 'the thieves hanged are by imagination, yet I trust to be even with them shortly in very deed'¹. Lee forbade the use of long strings of patronymics connected by the syllable ap in personal nomenclature, and bade Welshmen take a single surname. But the temper of the people was not, and could not be, hastily changed. The brigands were now outlawed, and ran risk of severe punishment. The national feeling tolerated them, domestic ties protected them, and the geographical features of the country made their capture difficult. Lord Herbert's grandfather and his father both suffered, as he tells us, from bands of robbers, but their theories of government were little in advance of those of their neighbours. To protect themselves, they did not appeal to the judges or to Ludlow Castle; they were content to summon their relatives and retainers, to take the law into their own hands, and to avenge themselves upon the families of those who had offended them². In 1557 Sir George Herbert of Swansea marched upon the castle of Oxwich in the absence of its owner, Sir Rice Mansel, and in the fight an aged relation of the owner was killed. In the streets of Cowbridge, Glamorganshire, a veritable battle took place in 1576 between the supporters of the Bassetts of Beaupré and those of the Turbervilles of Penlline. In both cases the combatants were led by members of the lords marchers' families, who were infected by their neighbours' turbulent spirit. In 1580, Sir Henry Sidney, the President of the Council, intervened in a serious contention 'betwixt the surnamed Thomases and Joneses', which threatened to involve all Wales³.

¹ The present Earl of Pembroke is the thirteenth in succession from the first Earl of the second creation (1551).

¹ See p. 5 and p. 6 note 1, supra.

² Letters and Papers of Henry VIII, v, 289.

³ This court was suspended by the Long Parliament in 1641, re-established at the Restoration, and finally abolished in 1689.

As late as 1607, a President of the Council of the Marches writes of such methods of procedure, that any man who is believed to have done his neighbour a wrong 'shall hardly escape a cruel revenge, even unto death', and that the governors are powerless, because where private feuds were concerned, all men of influence combined to suppress evidence⁴. Lord Herbert himself never extricated his mind from a patriarchal belief in the right of every

¹ Ellis's Letters, 3rd ser., ii, 364, 370.

² See pp. 2 and 4 supra.

³ Cf. the Siradling Correspondence, ed. Traherne, pp. 15-17.

⁴ History of Ludlow, pp. 356-69.

injured man to take personal vengeance with the aid of his family on his enemies and their families. The traditional wrongs which his relatives had suffered at the hands of the Vaughans he never forgot, and a Montague never regarded a Capulet with greater detestation than Herbert regarded any person bearing the hated name of Vaughan. The intermarriage of his sister with a Vaughan was vainly imagined by the more peaceful members of either family to be an effective treaty of peace¹; but readers of the autobiography will remark that the old spirit manifested itself in full intensity when Herbert met a few years later Sir Robert Vaughan². Valiant as the Welshmen were admitted on all hands to be, their choleric temperament, the result of baffled national hopes, made them objects of ridicule among Englishmen till the close of the seventeenth century. Intercourse between the two peoples had by that time familiarized the one with some real knowledge of the good as well as of the bad qualities of the other. But Shakespeare's Fluellen (a satirical phonetic spelling of the Welsh Llewelyn) indicates the highest esteem in which an Englishman held his Welsh fellow-subjects. Less thoughtful writers concentrated their attention on 'the rebellious attempts, the proud stomachs, the presumptuous stir, trouble, and rebellion of the fierce, unquiet, fickle, and necessitous Welshmen³'.

The social condition of Wales owed its lasting reform to strong administrators of the stamp of Roland Lee, and to the growth of such civilizing influences as commerce and education. Sir Henry Sidney, the father of Sir Philip Sidney, who was President of Wales from 1559 to 1586, did all that in him lay to suppress 'brawls and contentions', both by persuasion and coercion, and affairs so improved under his régime that he could assert, with some obvious touches of exaggeration, in a letter to Sir Francis Walsingham in 1583, that 'his great and high office in Wales' was 'a happy place of government, for a better people to govern or better subjects Europe holdeth not'. But successful as Sidney's rule undoubtedly was, it is to the translation of the Bible unto Welsh in 1567, to the establishment of free grammar schools like those of Carmarthen (1576), of Ruthin (1595), of Beaumaris (1603), of Hawarden (1609), and to the opening up of the metal and coal mines that the country chiefly owed its future peace and prosperity⁴.

¹ See p. 14, supra.

² See p. 100 et seq., supra.

³ Dedication of Powel's Historie of Cambria (1584) to Sir Philip Sidney.

⁴ The general authorities for this chapter are Miss Jane Williams' History of Wales; Documents Connected with the History of Ludlow, 1841; the first chapter of Mr. J. R. Phillip's Civil War in Wales, and Lord Herbert's History of Henry VIII, sub anno 1636. Churchyard, in his Worthies of Wales, 1589, patriotically insisted on the love of peace inherent among the Welsh, but his poetical picture is clearly overdrawn in order to refute the contrary opinion current among Englishmen.

III

Walton's and Donne's accounts of Lord Herbert's Mother

The following extract from Walton's Life of George Herbert, the poet (Lord Herbert's brother), throws additional light on Lord Herbert's relations with his mother while a student at the university : he does her fuller justice than Lord Herbert does her himself (see p. 9 et seq. supra). Walton's description of Lady Herbert's relations with Donne is one of the most beautiful passages in seventeenth century prose literature.

' In the time of her widowhood, she being desirous to give Edward, her eldest son, such advantages of learning and other education as might suit his birth and fortune, and thereby make him more fit for the service of his country, did, at his being of a fit age, remove from Montgomery Castle with him and some of her younger sons to Oxford ; and having entered Edward into Queen's College¹ and provided him a fit tutor, she commended him to his care ; yet she continued there with him, and still kept him in a moderate awe of herself, and so much under her own eye as to see and converse with him daily ; but she managed this power over him without any such rigid sourness as might make her company a torment to her child, but with such a sweetness and compliance with the recreations and pleasures of youth, as did incline him willingly to spend much of his time in the company of his dear and careful mother ; which was to her great content ; for she would often say, " That as our bodies take a nourishment suitable to the meat on which we feed, so our souls do as insensibly take in vice by the example or conversation with wicked company " ; and would therefore often say, " That ignorance of vice was the best preservation of virtue ; and that the very knowledge of wickedness was as tinder to inflame and kindle sin, and keep it burning ". For these reasons she endeared him to her own company, and continued with him in Oxford for four years ; in which time her great and harmless wit, her cheerful gravity, and her obliging behaviour gained her an acquaintance and friendship with most of any eminent worth or learning that were at that time in or near that University ; and particularly with Mr. John Donne, who then came accidentally to that place, in this time of her being there. It was that John Donne who was after Dr. Donne and Dean of St. Paul's, London ; and he, at his leaving Oxford, writ and left there, in verse, a character of the beauties of her body and mind. Of the first he says,

No Spring nor Summer beauty has such grace,
As I have seen in an Autumnal face.

¹ This is an error. See p. 21, supra. Herbert was entered at University College.

Of the latter he says,

In all her words, to every hearer fit,
You may at revels or at council sit.

The rest of her character may be read in his printed poems, in that elegy which bears the name of The Autumnal Beauty; for both he and she were then past the meridian of man's life.

'This amity, begun at this time and place, was not an amity that polluted their souls, but an amity made up of a chain of suitable inclinations and virtues; an amity like that of St. Chrysostom's to his dear and virtuous Olympias, whom in his letters he calls his Saint; or an amity, indeed, more like that of St. Hierome to his Paula, whose affection to her was such, that he turned poet in his old age, and then made her epitaph, wishing all his body were turned into tongues, that he might declare her just praises to posterity. And this amity betwixt her and Mr. Donne was begun in a happy time for him, he being then near to the fortieth year of his age—which was some years before he entered into Sacred Orders:—a time when his necessities needed a daily supply for the support of his wife, seven children, and a family. And in this time she proved one of his most bountiful benefactors, and he as grateful an acknowledger of it. You may take one testimony for what I have said of these two worthy persons from this following letter and sonnet:

"MADAM,—Your favours to me are everywhere: I use them and have them. I enjoy them at London, and leave them there; and yet find them at Mitcham. Such riddles as these become things inexpressible; and such is your goodness. I was almost sorry to find your servant here this day, because I was loath to have any witness of my not coming home last night and indeed of my coming this morning. But my not coming was excusable, because earnest business detained me; and my coming this day is by the example of your St. Mary Magdalen, who rose early upon Sunday to seek that which she loved most; so did I. And from her and myself I return such thanks as are due to one to whom we owe all the good opinion that they whom we need must have of us. By this messenger and on this good day I commit the enclosed Holy Hymns and Sonnets—which for the matter, not the workmanship, have yet escaped the fire—to your judgment, and to your protection too, if you think them worthy of it; and I have appointed this enclosed Sonnet to usher them to your happy hand.—Your unworthiest servant, unless your accepting him to be so have mended him,

JO. DONNE.

"MITCHAM, July 11, 1607.

To the Lady Magdalen Herbert, of St. Mary Magdalen

' Her of your name, whose fair inheritance
 Bethina was, and jointure Magdalo,
 An active faith so highly did advance,
 That she once knew more than the Church did know,
 The Resurrection ! so much good there is Delivered of her, that some Fathers be Loth to believe one woman could do this,
 But think these Magdalens were two or three.
 Increase their number, Lady, and their fame :
 To their devotion add your innocence :
 Take so much of th' example, as of the name :
 The latter half ; and in some recompense
 That they did harbour Christ himself, a guest,
 Harbour these Hymns, to his dear name address.—J. D'.

These Hymns are now lost to us ; but doubtless they were such as they two now sing in heaven.

' There might be more demonstrations of the friendship and the many sacred endearments betwixt these two excellent persons,—for I have many of their letters in my hand, — and much more might be said of her great prudence and piety ; but my design was not to write hers, but the life of her son ; and therefore I shall only tell my reader that about that very day twenty years that this letter was dated and sent her, I saw and heard this Mr. John Donne—who was then Dean of St. Paul's—weep, and preach her funeral sermon in the parish church of Chelsea, near London ¹, where she now rests in her quiet grave ; and where we must now leave her, and return to her son George, whom we left in his study at Cambridge '.

Dr. Donne's sermon gives similar testimony to Lady Herbert's sweetness of temper, and does not, with both Herbert and Walton, overlook the fact of her second marriage to Sir John Danvers. The following passages towards the close of the sermon are of special interest :

' From that worthy family from which she had her original extraction and birth ², she sucked that love of hospitality (hospitality which hath celebrated that family for many generations successively) which dwelt in her to her end. But in that ground, her father's family, she grew not many years. Transplanted young from thence by marriage into another family of honour, as a flower that doubles and multiplies by transplantation, she multiplied into ten children,—Job's number and Job's distribution (as she would often remember), seven sons and three daughters. And in this ground she grew not many more years than were necessary for the providing of so many plants. And being then left to choose her own ground in her widowhood, having at home established and increased the estate with a fair and noble addition, proposing to herself, as her principal care, the education of her children; to advance that she came with them and dwelt with them in the university, and recompensed them the loss of a father in giving them two mothers—her own personal care and the advantage of that place, where she contracted a friendship with divers reverend persons of eminency and estimation there, which continued to their ends. And as this was her greatest business, so she made this state a large period, for in this state of widowhood she continued twelve years. And then returning to a second marriage, that second marriage turns us to the consideration of another personal circumstance, that is, the natural endowments of her person, which were such as that her personal and natural endowments had their part in drawing and fixing the affections of such a person,¹ as by his birth and youth, and interest in great favours at court, and legal proximity to great possessions in the world, might justly have promised him acceptance in what family soever or upon what person soever he had directed and placed his affections. He placed them here, neither diverted thence nor repented since. For as the well tuning of an instrument makes higher and lower strings of one sound, so the inequality of their years was thus reduced to an evenness that she had a cheerfulness agreeable to his youth, and he had a sober staidness conformable to her more advanced years. So that I would not consider her at so much more than forty, nor him at so much less than thirty, at that time; but as their persons were made one, and their fortunes made one by marriage, so I would put their years into one number, and finding a sixty between them think them thirty apiece; for as twins of one hour they lived. . . . God gave her such a comeliness as, though she were not proud of it, yet she was so content with it as not to go about to mend it by any art. And for her attire (which is another personal circumstance), it was never sumptuous, never sordid, but always agreeable to her quality and agreeable to her company; such as she might, and such as others such as she was did wear'. . . . Respecting her charitable-ness Donne says: 'She gave not at some great days or at some solemn goings abroad, but as God's true almoners, the sun and moon, that pass on in a continual doing of good, as she received her daily bread from God, so daily she distributed and imparted it to others. In which office though she never turned her face from those who, in a strict inquisition, might be called idle and vagrant beggars, yet she ever looked first upon them who laboured, whose labours could not overcome the difficulties nor bring in the necessities of this life, and to the sweat of their brows she contributed even her wine and her oil, and anything that was, and anything that might be, if it were not prepared for her own table. And as her house was a court, with conversation of the best, and an almshouse in feeding the poor, so was it also an hospital in ministering relief to the sick. And truly, the love of doing good in this kind, of ministering to the sick, was the honey that spread over all her bread; the air the perfume that breathed over all her house. . . . As the rule of all her civil actions was religion, so the rule of her religion was the Scripture; and her rule for her particular understanding of the Scripture was the Church. . . . In the doctrine and discipline of that Church in which God sealed her to Himself in baptism she brought up her children, she assisted her family, she dedicated her soul to God in her life, and surrendered it to Him in her death; and in that form of common prayer which is ordained by that Church and to which she had accustomed herself with her family twice every day, she joined that company which was about her death-bed in answering to every part thereof which the congregation is directed to answer to, with a clear understanding, with a constant memory, with a distinct voice, not two hours before she died. According to this promise, that is, the will of God manifested in the Scriptures, she expected this that she hath received, God's physic and God's music—a christianly death¹.

¹ On 1st July, 1627. See p. 10 n 3, supra.

² The Newports.

¹ Sir John Danvers.

Duelling in France and England in the early years of the Seventeenth Century

Duelling holds no more prominent place in Lord Herbert's autobiography than it deserves to hold in any full social history of James I's reign. The practice, although long discredited by men of sense, sprang into new life in England in the early years of the seventeenth century. The cause of the revival is probably to be found in the intimate relations existing between men of fashion in England and France. To impetuous Frenchmen like Balagny² the duello was indispensable, and when Englishmen imitated French social customs, they adopted unconsciously the most characteristic feature of French social life—that sensitive regard for what Frenchmen called their honour. Henri IV perceived the disadvantage of the practice of duelling, and in stern edicts denounced it as a capital offence. But the edicts were systematically disobeyed, and the

¹ See Afford's edition of Donne's Works, vi, 271 et seq., or the original duodecimo edition of the sermon (1627), pp. 137 et seq.

² See p. 57, supra.

King had not resolution enough to refuse a pardon to those who infringed them. He entreated his generals to discountenance the practice, but was himself unwilling to employ coercion in the matter. Between 1589 and 1607, it has been estimated that 4,000 Frenchmen met their death in duels. Montaigne, illustrating the bellicose spirit of his fellow-countrymen, humorously states that if three Frenchmen met together in the Libyan desert, they would demand satisfaction of each other at the sword's point. It was left to Richelieu to inaugurate a determined policy of repression¹.

In England matters were little better. Every family of distinction lost some promising cadet in the early years of the century by duelling, and the foreign wars in which Englishmen were in the habit of engaging as free and independent volunteers encouraged in them a spirit of aggression without accustoming them to strict military discipline. The war in Cleves and Juliers was fertile in duels among Englishmen, in spite of the precautions taken both by Sir Edward Cecil and Count Maurice, and the quarrels, although invariably based on very flimsy pretexts, resulted in very many fatalities. In 1609 Sir Hatton Cheek killed Sir Thomas Dalton in a duel fought on the Calais sands, in which both combatants were armed, according to the French rules, with rapier as well as dagger². Herbert's disputes with Lord Howard of Walden and Sir Thomas Somerset came happily to a spiritless and bloodless conclusion; but a similar encounter between Edward, Lord Bruce of Kinloss, and Sir Edward Sackville was pursued in deadly earnest. The quarrel arose out of a love-suit, and after several abortive meetings in Holland and England, the two men fought on September 1613 under the walls of Antwerp, where Bruce was killed and Sackville severely wounded³. Steele has given a faithful account of this long and sanguinary conflict in Nos. 129 and 133 of the Guardian, from Sackville's manuscript narrative. Nicholas Charles, Lancaster Herald, writing to Sir Robert Cotton of the termination of this meeting, declares (10th September 1613) the world of London to be full of rumours of duels to be fought abroad. 'A gentleman of [Lord Harrington]', he says, '[was] very treacherously killed by the means of Sir Andrew Keith master of the horse to the Lady Elizabeth⁴. But Keith is in hold to be sent over into England. There is also a quarrel between my Lord of Essex and Mr. Harry Howard⁵, and one of them is gotten over, but there were letters

¹ Brantôme's Memoirs give the best account of duelling in France under Henry IV.

² These weapons were to be used in Herbert's duel with Lord Howard. It was usual in France for the seconds to fight as well as the principals.

³ Clarendon's History, i, 60; Wauwood's Memorials, iii, 422, 454, 476.

⁴ The Electress-Palatine. Further particulars of this quarrel are given in a letter printed in Court and Times of James I, i, 265. Sir Andrew Keith was guilty of a murderous assault on a gentleman named Bashall, which closely resembles Ayres' attack on Herbert at Whitehall.

⁵ Brother of Lord Howard of Walden.

sent to the Archduke and the French King to prevent their desperate proceedings. There is also talk of a quarrel between my Lord of Rutland and my Lord Danvers, as also of other noble and gentlemen of good quality' ¹. Chamberlain, the well-known gossip, gave even more alarming proofs of the prevalence of duels at this moment. 'Though there yet be', he writes (9th September 1613), 'in shew a settled peace in these parts of the world, yet the many private quarrels are very great, and prognostic troubled humours, which may breed dangerous diseases, if they be not purged and prevented. I doubt not but you have heard the success of the combat between Edward Sackville and Lord Bruce of Kinlos. . . . Here is speech likewise that the Lord Norris and Sir Peregrine Willoughby are gone forth for the same purpose, and that the Lord Chandos and Lord Hay are upon the same terms: there was a quarrel kindling betwixt the Earls of Rutland and Montgomery, but it was quickly quenched by the King, being begun and ended in his presence. But there is more danger betwixt the Earl of Rutland and the Lord Danvers, though I heard yesterday it was already or upon the point of compounding. But that which most now listen after is what will fall out betwixt the Earl of Essex and Mr. Henry Howard, who is challenged and called to account by the Earl for certain disgraceful speeches of him. They are both gotten over, the Earl from Milford Haven, the other from Harwich, with each of them two seconds. The Earl has his base brother and one Captain Onseley, or rather, as most affirm, Sir Thomas Beaumont, as one interested in the quarrel'. In a later letter Chamberlain describes the action of the Council taken in this business ².

These practices ill assorted with James I's pacific temperament, and he took vigorous steps to suppress them. He directed his Ministers to collect information as to the mode of dealing with such breaches of the peace on the Continent, and then issued a proclamation, penned with his own hand, calling on his peaceable subjects to support his repressive policy ³. The Star Chamber was directed to take the matter in hand, and, to make a preliminary example, two 'base mechanical persons', named Priest and Wright, were charged by the Crown, the one with sending a challenge, and the other with accepting it. Sir Francis Bacon, the new Attorney-General, conducted the prosecution, and in a speech full of common sense and high principle illustrated the evils of the practice. 'It is a miserable effect', he said in one of the finest passages, 'when young men full of towardness and hope, such as the poets call auroræ filii, sons of the morning, in whom the expectation and comfort of their friends consisteth, shall be cast away and destroyed in such a vain manner; but much more it is to be deplored when so much noble and gentle blood shall be spilt upon such follies, as if it were adventured in the field in the service of the king and the realm, were able to make the fortune of a day and to change the future of a kingdom.' Coke delivered judgment against the prisoners. Priest was ordered to pay £500, and Wright 500 marks, and both had to do penance at the next Surrey assizes, and to remain in Fleet prison for some months. The Star Chamber decree and Coke's judgment were printed and widely circulated¹. But the reader will remember that these proceedings had little effect on Herbert, who, until he was well past middle life, was always anxious to find opportunity for a duel. Massinger and Chapman, with other Jacobean dramatists, continued to make duelling an important feature in their portraits of contemporary society. That the practice died hard in England, and temporarily revived whenever the morality of the upper classes suffered serious deterioration, students of the reign of Charles II and of the Regency well know. But when the thinness of the arguments in its favour was once thoroughly exposed by Bacon and Coke, and re-exposed by vigorous writers like Jeremy Collier and Steels, it was virtually abandoned to the thoughtless and the idle².

¹ Ellis's Original Letters, 2d ser., iii, 234.

² Court and Times of James I, i, 272, 276.

³ In a MS. volume in the Cottonian Library in the British Museum are many documents relating to the history of duelling in England at the time. In Ellis's Letters, 1st ser., iii, 107-10, is printed from the volume Sir Francis Cottington's account of the treatment of duellists in Spain. Sir John Finet, writing from Paris, 19th February 1609-10, is the author of another account there, treating of the duels in France.

V

Lord Herbert's quarrel with Lord Howard of Walden

In the MS. Lansdowne in the British Museum (xcix. art. 99) is a copy of some of the correspondence that passed between Sir Edward Herbert and Lord Howard of Walden relative to their quarrel, together with an account of the curious incident by Peyton, Lord Howard's second. The document runs thus³:

S^r E[dward] H[erbert], his first letter.

MY LORD,—Though for the matter in question between us I do not hold myself bound to seek you, yet, since I have withdrawn myself, I have thought fit to acquaint yourself that I will wait your leisure any time before your going into England, to give that honest account that I promised and shall ever maintain.

¹ Spedding's Life and Letters of Bacon, iv, 395-416.

² In Hearne's Curious Discourses (1771), ii, 225 et seq., is a singular paper signed 'Edward Cook', entitled Duello Foiled. It purports to be a paper prepared before 1604 for a meeting of the ancient Society of Antiquaries, originally formed by Archbishop Parker in 1572, and recounts the devices successfully adopted by the friends of the two would-be duellists to prevent a meeting. The correspondence that passed between the disputants is given at length. Jeremy Collier's Dialogue of Duelling, in his Essays upon Several Moral Subjects (1698), i, 113 et seq., is an amusing and vigorous piece of reasoning.

³ I have modernized the spelling.

E[DWARD] H[ERBERT].

The answer.

S^r ED. HERBERT,—I have not withdrawn myself from the place you left me in: if you have anything to say to me, you may easily find me before my going into England.

T[HEOPHILUS] H[OWARD].

The second letter.

MY LORD,—Since I perceive your Lordship satisfied so far that you have not any meaning to call me in question, which by your Lordship's offer to draw your sword I might have conjectured, and that neither by it nor any way else I find not myself to have received the least hurt from you, I shall no longer trouble myself to satisfy your Lordship, unless you deny this in any particular.

E[DWARD] H[ERBERT].

Answer.

S^r ED. HERBERT,—I am so well satisfied with my own actions that I will trouble myself no further.

T[HEOPHILUS] H[OWARD].

'Upon this passed by me ¹ from Sir Ed. Herbert to my Lord a courteous message, and afterwards a reconciliation between them made by my Lord General ². Some four or five days after Sir Herbert wrote a challenge in these words ³:

MY LORD,—Having lately understood that a report of your Lordship's striking me is gone so far as to M. Betune and M. de Chatillon ⁴, and that, for anything I know, it may be so related in England, and that the authors of this report may be lackeys or people unworthy my revenge, to the end I may put my honour out of dispute, I have thought fit to require your Lordship so to clear this that I may be declared as free from any touch from your Lordship as I know myself to be, or that you would think of some time and place in your return to do me reason, protesting that upon whether of these your Lordship shall resolve, that neither malice nor desire to win upon your Lordship's honour causeth this, but only a necessity so to right myself, so that I may be held worthy in honest reputation. So attending your Lordship's answer at Dusseldorf, which, in regard of our reconciliation, I must make any way questionable, I rest your Lordship's humble servant,

E[DWARD] H[ERBERT].

This 11th of September 1610.

¹ The writer is Peyton, Lord Howard's second.

² Sir Edward Cecil.

³ Herbert, on pp. 62-3 supra, overlooks this correspondence, and admits no preliminary settlement of the dispute.

⁴ Two French generals, see page 62, note 1.

' This was sent by one Mr. Turner of my Lord Governor's company after Sir Edward Herbert had taken his leave of my Lord General and his Excellency¹ and withdrawn himself into the woods. My Lord would take no hold of the former reconciliation, as he might well have done, to refuse him, but, as soon as I could be called to him from his Excellency his quarter, returned this answer :

The answer.

S^a ED. HERBERT,—I thought you had been satisfied of the things passed betwixt us ; but since I find by your letter that it is not so, I will answer you at the time and place so appointed, as this bearer shall acquaint you with.

T[HEOPHILUS] H[OWARD].

' I found him by the woodside near his Excellency his quarter ; he withdrew himself with me from the company he had, being Captain Herbert² and a servant or two, and received the answer with much contentment at my Lord's honourable proceeding. Demanding of me the circumstances left to my relation, I first required to know his second, since my Lord had chosen me. He would fain have had none, but since my Lord's pleasure was such, he chose his own brother, which I accepted of, and told him my Lord would meet him the next morning on horseback with a single rapier. I had not the length of it with me, but desired that he would send his second to my quarter about dinner-time and he should see it : all which he accepted of, and desired me to tell my Lord that he would come up to him bravely without malice, to fight for his own honour and the honour of his nation, and desired me to be secret. I answered he needed not to doubt my secrecy, nor to be met with like resolution as he spake of. About dinner-time himself instead of his second came near our quarter, and sent in a gentleman, his servant, named Omerfelde (?), who told me his master desired to speak with me. I went to him ; he asked me the length of my Lord's sword. I told him I did expect his brother to fetch it, because he had so appointed. Nevertheless, if he would stay there, he should have it : he desired that that servant of his might bring it him. I said it had been more proper for his brother, yet I would not be therein curious : so we both together measured the sword, and I gave him the length of it. I told him the place should be on the farther side of that wood where I found him in the morning. He uttered some discontentment at his want of horses, yet said he would come on any he could get, how unfit soever, or on foot, and let my Lord use the advantage. I answered my Lord sought no advantage, but he knew how my Lord would come provided : that if he had challenged at the first, he might have had more time, but now my Lord being upon the point of departure, he had no reason to delay his own affairs for his satisfaction. He said he was sorry that his inquiry for horses might give suspicion of what was intended. About four of the clock in the afternoon the same Omerfield came to me with a sword that was a thought longer than my Lord's, protesting that he could find no cutler in all the army, it being Sunday, but that he would use all diligence to make it even. I told him I did expect no less, and desired that Mr. Herbert might come to me : he said he should, and so afterwards he did, and we had a slight view of one another's weapons.

¹ Count Maurice.

² Either William or Thomas Herbert. See pp. 11-2, supra.

'Sir Edward Herbert guessed rightly that his inquiry for horses would spread the business. For he sought in likely places to be well furnished, [but would not have been discovered] if he had not been refused first of Sir Charles Morgan, to whom he was free of the end, and desired him to be his second, but was refused of both¹, then to Count Henry², and then M. de Chatillon and divers others to borrow horses. M. Chatillon sent for Sir Charles Morgan, and told him that he saw Mr. Herbert take leave of his Excellency, and now that he came to borrow great horses ; laying these things together, he could guess it was to fight with my Lord of Walden . . . [?], and that he being an officer in chief of the army, held himself bound to impart his suspicion to his Excellency. In the evening these bruits and others spread, I know not how, even unto the particularities of weapon (so that nothing but the time and place were secret), moved my Lord to leave the General's quarter and me to meet his Lordship, but I should have been stopped in our own quarter. We spent the most part of the night in Sir John Ratcliffe's quarter, holding as good watches as we could to prevent a surprise of any guard that his Excellency might have sent, and about three or four of the clock we went to the woodside appointed, where they were to fight by seven. We walked twice the whole length of the woodside and saw nobody, then withdrew ourselves into the covert of the wood, lest some horsemen might discover and take us. When it grew lightsome, my lackey told us he saw two men walking by the woodside on whitish horses : my Lord, after a small pause, bade me look out to see if it were Sir Edward Herbert, and, if it were, to let him know he may hear from him. I walked out so far as I might discern the whole side of the wood, but [saw] no two horsemen ; yet thinking they might be covered for the same purpose that we were, I walked there a pretty while that they might discern me. But seeing nobody show out of the wood, and considering it was yet before the hour, I returned to my Lord. About a quarter of an hour after, his Lordship bade me look out again, and then I was quickly driven back by the sight of a horseman, who passing by and keeping his course, I went out and saw another galloping towards, which I hoped to have been Mr. Herbert, but when he came near enough for me to discern my error, I returned to our covert.

¹ i.e. both request for horses and second.

² Brother of Count Maurice.

'Then I sent out my lackey to discover the worst, who told me very soon that all the woodside was laid with horsemen; and we might see them seour up and down, but kept ourselves as close as we could. About half an hour after this, being near the hour appointed, Mr. Selinger came directly to us, and told my Lord that he attended to no purpose, for my Lord General had taken Sir Edward Herbert long sinec in the middle of the wood, not far from the place where he seemed to have lodged that night; that he was mounted upon a great horse of Sir James Erskin's, who being at Aix, his lieutenant had furnished Sir Edward Herbert [with horses] either voluntarily or receiving a letter from his Captain: further, that he had with him a Scotsman, and not his brother (who was intercepted in Reymester), that this Scotsman had a case of pistols, all which seemed very strange to us, that expected him with a second armed as I was, with rapier and dagger, and two lackeys without weapons. The colour of this Scotsman's horse being bay, it seemed to us that the two horsemen which my servant had seen were not these, and consequently that Sir Edward Herbert had not been on the very place appointed at all: but in truth, the wood was so laid before the time assigned, that it had been to no purpose, since they could not fight in the woods, and any ground chosen without must have offered them to the full power of all the horsemen. Thus prevented by the care of his Excellency and my Lord General, and being entreated by a messenger from him to go home, we left the wood and came to our quarters.

J. PEYTON¹.

VI

The following were the instructions given to Herbert by James the First on his first mission to France. The original is preserved at Powis Castle².

¹ The indistinct signature may be T. Peyton, but another copy of Peyton's account, described by Mr. J. C. Jeaffreson in the Hist. MSS. Com. Fifth Rep., has the signature J. See p. 63, supra. The paper is labelled, 'Challenge betwixt my Lord Walden and Sir Edward Herbert. September 1610'.

² Powysland Collections, vi, 417. See p. 102, supra.

JAMES R.

Instructions for our trustie and well beloved servant Sir Edwar Herbert, Knight, our Ambassador with the French King.

Having occasion at this present to employ some person of speciale quality, judgement, discretion and trust to reside as our ambassador with our good brother the French king, we have out of our princely favour been pleased to make choice of you as of one whom we hold in all respects sufficient and capable of such an employment, and of whose fidelity and zealous affection to our service we have ever entertayned a gracious opinion.

There be not many particulars that we have to give you in charge by way of instructe'n, nor shall it be greatly needfull if you observe but this one generall end, and thereunto apply you endeavors, which is, to give that king the best assurance you may from time to time of our brotherly friendship and affee'on towards him, letting him know that to this purpose principally we have sent you as our ambassador to reside near his person; and you may tell him further that howsoever by the means of all instruments and minist'rs there hath been of late some misunderstanding between us, yet nevertheless there should never enter into our heart the least sparke of ill affee'on towards him, as on the other side this last honour and courtisy that he hath done us by sending hitler a gentleman so qualified and every way accomplished as is the Marquis of Tresnel, and so timely to declare his condolence with us for the death of our late dearest wife the queen, hath imprinted in us that certaine perswasion and assurance of his reciprocall friendship towards us; we thereupon being very unwilling to be prevented in courtisy or in doing that honour which we desired, have made all the hast that possibly we might to dispatch you away unto him before any ordinary enbassador should come from thence unto us.

And because the meaning is not to be wanting in any good office which may testify the reality of our professions unto him, you shall let him know that we, understanding of the troubles in governing his kingdom is at this present embroyled, have given the order, as well out of our singular love unto him, as also in regard of the promise wee made to the king his father of happy memory, to offer him in our name the best assistance that we can afford him, either by our faithful advice or otherwise, whensoever he shall have at any time occasion or use of our help, and shall think fit to signify so much unto us.

Next you shall take notice of the great obligation we have unto him, and gave him thanks accordingly for the true sense he hath of our present griepe and affliction by reason of the queen's death, our dearest wife, as his ambassador (the Marquis of Tresnel) hath expressed the same unto us, assuring him that, for our part, we cannot be less sensible of anything that may befall him, but must be equally affected, either with joy or sorrow, as the subject shall give cause; neither may you omit to perform the like ceremony unto the queen.

And hereupon you may take a fitt occasion to congratulate him in our name for the marriage of his sister, Madame Chrestienne, with the Prince of Piemont, to which alliance we wish all honour and happiness, as well for the interest which the king hath therein of himself, as also in respect of the singular affee'on we bear unto the House of Savoy, and the strict amity which is betwixt us and that duke at this present.

Lastly, whereas it was agreed and concluded by a treaty dated the 19th of August in the year 1610, betwixt certain commissioners appointed on our part, and Le Sieur de la Boderie, then ambassador from the French king, residing here with us, on behalf of the king his master, that forasmuch as the sayed king was at that time in his minority, he should therefore afterwards, when he came to be major, take a solernn oath for the observation of all things conteyned in the said treaty, being thereunto duly required by a aumbassador sufficiently authorised for such a purpose. We have to that end enabled you, by a commission under our greate seale of England in his name, to require and to take the sayd oath, hereby willing and commaunding you to see the same effectted according to your comission in such due manner and form as is usual in like cases.

GEO. CALVERT.

7th May 1619

VII

Lord Herbert's Correspondence

The earliest extant letters with which I have met are four addressed by Herbert to his guardian Sir George More of Loseley in 1602-1603. They have been already printed in Kempe's Loseley MSS., pp. 143-146. In August 1602 Herbert was in his twentieth year¹.

Lord Herbert to his Father-in-wardship, Sir George More.

Worthy Father, if I were persuaded that you did amare ex judicio, and not judicare ex amore, your good opinion of me would make me show more to deserve the continuance of it, than the greatest discouragement of my little abilities could prevail to the breaking of my weak beginnings.

Lest you should think this country ruder than it is, I have sent you some of our bread, which I am sure will be dainty, howsoever it be not pleasing; it is a kind of cake which our country people use, and made in no place in England, but in Shrewsbury—if you vouchsafe the taste of them, you enworthy the country and sender. Measure not my love by substance of it, which is brittle; but by the form of it, which is circular, and circulus you know is capacissima figura, to which that mind ought to be like, that can most worthily love you. Yet I would not have you to understand form so as though it were hereby formal; but, as forma dat esse, so my love and observance to be essential; and so wishing it worthy your acceptance, I rest—Your son that knoweth your worth,

HERBERT.

Scribbled raptim as you see, and hope will pardon.

EXTON, this 17th of August 1602.

To the right worthy and his honourable friend Sir George More, Knight, his beloved father, etc.

¹ I have not printed the letters at full length, but given only the most important passages.

Noble Knight, I perceive your love placed in this our family to be as faithful in continuance, as it hath been excessive in greatness, when you will send to find us out in a corner among the totò divisos orbe Britannos; such a love in these days wants an example, and is not like to be patterned; only to us it is a comfort, that desire at least to be thankful, that seeing it was begun without our desert, we need not stand doubtful of ourselves, as knowing that his worthy disposition that began it of himself, will continue it as undeservedly as he did unmatchably enter into it. This small testimony doth your many kindnesses challenge at my hands, who doth more honour your virtues than the pied outside of an hereditary nobility.

I hear of your indeed royal entertainment of the King; a happiness able to make you forget yourself, much more your remote friends, were it not you.

I am very sorry to hear of the increase of the plague, which besides many inconveniences, will hinder our meeting this many a day, I fear. I pray God to stay His heavy hand, in whom I wish both our preservations, as—The son that lives more than half in his loving father,

HERBERT.

MONTGOMERY CASTLE, this 28th of August 1603.

I pray you present my due salutations to your lady, and Sir Robert Moore and his lady, not forgetting good Mr. Polsted.

To that worthy knight, Sir George More, at his house, Loseley, in Surrey, etc.

If absence (noble knight) could afford friends a better testimony of love than remembrance, or remembrance express itself in a better fashion than in letters, to you especially, to your nought-needing self (if either invention or example would have yielded me a newer means), my engaged love would not have omitted the execution of it to your worthy self, unto whom the greatest service I can profess is too little to be performed; but where means scant the manifestation of more, let your acceptance make that good, which my ability could make no better. I pray you think not that, because my letter contains not any essential business, that therefore it is merely formal, but rather that my thankfulness would disclose itself in any shape sooner than forego the least occasion to show how many ways he is—Yours,

HERBERT.

MONTGOMERY CASTLE, this 12th of October 1603.

To my much honoured father, Sir George More, Loseley, in Surrey.

Your continual remembrance of us (noble knight), though it cannot add to the opinion of your worthy love (only in respect of yourself worthy); yet it may confirm it, if there can be a confirmation of that which is held most assured.

The barrenness of this country, as in all other things, is dilated into the scarcity of any occurrence fit your entertaining, much unlike your part, where all good varieties warring among themselves distract the mind in their choice, of some of which as you have made me partake so the most acceptable beyond comparison was to hear of your health.

If there be a Parliament shortly, if I can, I will be one of the number, a burgesse or something, rather than get out, for I think I shall give away my interest in this shire to another; not making doubt to meet you there, though once in my hearing you seemed to be weary of your being of the House.

So with the protestation of an unfeigned affection to do you any acceptable service, I rest—Your adopted son in name, but natural all other ways,

HERBERT.

MONTGOMERY CASTLE, this 4th of December, 1603.

I must give my lady great thanks (for in my letter I have testified of you) for my little brother.

Mr. Henry Morrice remembers his love to you, with many thanks for your kind entertainment of him when he was with you.

To his most honoured father, Sir George More, Knight, at Loseley, give these.

In the British Museum is a valuable volume in manuscript containing Herbert's correspondence during his embassy in France for the years 1619 and 1620. It is among the Additional MSS., and is numbered 7082. I have had the whole of it copied, and give below some extracts likely to prove of interest to the reader of Herbert's life. The volume opens with a series of letters addressed by Herbert to the Prince of Orange and other English and foreign friends, announcing the writer's appointment to the French embassy. In the first letter addressed to the King (fol. 8) Herbert writes (under date 29th May 1619, stilo Anglico) that the distracting quarrel between Louis XIII and his mother Marie de Medeis had been compounded and the former released from her imprisonment at Blois¹. Herbert concludes thus:

I cannot omit to tell your Majesty of a circumstance which had almost broken this peace about the time that it was most treated of by the Commissioners. . . . For whilst these did negotiate there was discovered a design to give fire to the powder in the castle, the ruins whereof were likely to fall upon the Queen's lodgings, that were not far off. They lay the fault upon the Comte de Schomberg, but he excuseth himself. In the meantime the Queen made a long complaint thereof unto the King. It is much desired by the Prince of Piedmont, son of the Duke of Savoy, that the King and Queen-mother should meet: but some dislike it, as fearing natural affection should bring them too near: others dislike it, lest repetition of unkindness should put them further assunder: they therefore who labour this prescribe the words and behaviour on both sides. This is the substance of all I can learn as yet worthy your Majesty's knowledge.

Another letter (fol. 13) of the same date to the King begins with a characteristic apology for the writer's style:

¹ See p. 104, supra.

I must humbly desire in all my letters to be thus understood, that if the second do not contradict the first, your Majesty would be pleased to take it as a confirmation. For my last I find nothing in it to reform, if your Majesty be pleased to pardon the rudeness and ignorance of my style, which I therefore humbly submit unto your Majesty's good acceptation.

The settlement between the Queen-mother and the French King was menaced by the rude behaviour of the Queen's messenger to Luynes, the King's favourite, who had really instigated Louis XIII to attack his mother, and whose true character Herbert soon came to know and detest. But at first he had only good words for Luynes.

The Comte de Bresne . . . being sent unto the French king on a message from her, did not only omit to salute Mons. de Luynes, having first saluted all the rest, but braved him in such a fashion that it was interpreted by some as a slighting of the favour the French King hath showed him, which I hear the King took very ill, and therefore dismissed him without answer. This hath made P. Benille travail again, and the labour is now to bring the Queen and Mons. de Luynes to accord. . . . I find Mons. de Luynes much envied, but cannot learn wherein his greatest enemies can justly tax¹ him; for they avow his intentions are good: that so at most they can find no fault with him but that he cannot help, wherein they conclude him better than themselves.

. . . For myself, I am invited by the French King to come to him: for which purpose Mons. de Puisieux (secretaire des commandements du Roy) writ me a letter as in his Majesty's name. This makes me prepare to find him at Tours, though I have somewhat deferred it, in hope of your Majesty's further commandments. But on Monday, God willing, shall go, if I hear nothing to the contrary; for so was your Majesty's pleasure at my departure. . . .

Herbert finally reports a rumour that the Prince of Piedmont is a candidate for the throne of the Empire which has just become vacant, and expresses a hope that the rumour is true.

'But', he adds, 'we must not prevent² your Majesty's judgment and wisdom with our inconsiderations'.

With this letter Herbert sends another note (fol. 15), stating that a man named James Haig had discovered to him a Jesuit plot against James's life.

Writing to the Secretary Naunton (fol. 26) on ¹⁰/₂₀ July 1619, Herbert refers to Count Henry of Nassau's visit to France³, and to the French jealousy of the Dutch. He points out in vigorous terms the advantage of a permanent alliance between Holland and England and first notifies the approach of the plague to Paris:

¹ i.e. censure.

² i.e. anticipate.

³ See p. 108, supra.

The estate of these parts is still alike full of change and uncertainty and for those that look on of entertainment. . . . Comte Henry¹ going to see the King at Tours on his way to Orange, was invited nowhere but to the council table; where after a chair presented him to sit down, he was expostulated about the death of Barnaveldt, and told in these express words the act was unjust and barbarous withal. I hear since (by the Holland Ambassador) there is a command given to seize on all the Dutch ships in French ports, and that the French take it very ill our new league with the Hollander, wherein they understand we have excluded the French from the East-Indies, which has made them to vaunt as to talk of sending out a fleet to right themselves. All I will infer out of this, is to beseech your Honour (as a true and noble English heart) to take this occasion to dispose the King and state to enter into a straight league with the Hollander, who alone on earth can either hurt or do us good.

I have not written at all unto his Majesty at this time, because I know not what news you may have of the plague here: there are but some twenty-four or twenty-five houses infected in all the town; besides it is not very infectious nor mortal, for the one half escape, and I see no body dislodge; yet the Parliament speaks of retiring, which if it much increase I will follow.

On 14th July 1619 Herbert informs (fol. 28) Sir Robert Naunton that he has sent to Mons. de Luynes, to let him know his Majesty doth understand, and will accept of his services. All this I have chosen to do by letter, that I might not put his Majesty to unnecessary charges: yet if your honour think fit I should go, I doubt not to overtake any inconvenience the business may suffer by my absence.

On 23rd July Herbert sent a French letter to Luynes, expressing James I's high esteem of his proffer of friendship to England (fol. 30). Luynes replied on 27th July (fol. 32) and paid Herbert many high-flown compliments.

Herbert, on 29th July, found it necessary (fol. 34) to urge Naunton to hand over to the French government a French malefactor who had fled to England and been taken into Buckingham's favour. He argues that it is a mere act of international courtesy:

I come to the latter part of your letter, which is concerning Gautier, who for having killed a brave French gentleman and of a noble house in a most base fashion fled to England, where for his excelling on the lute he was received into the favour of my Lord the Marquis of Buckingham. I therefore thought fit first to acquaint his Lordship (who I assure myself never understood his fault) what this King demands concerning him: but having received no answer as yet, I humbly beseech your Honour to represent unto his Lordship, that whereas the English could not lately walk the street without affront and injuries [in Paris], they are now restored to all the favours and good opinion they can desire: besides, since they have accorded all my requests both for our state and particular persons, that his Lordship would be pleased to think at least of some indifferent way for their satisfaction in this. In the mean I do not so much as incline your Honour any way, having no other design but, together with my due respects to my Lord the Marquis Buckingham, to acquit myself of my obligation to this place. But your Honour shall understand more at large of all these particulars by the Comte de Tillieres¹, who set forth on Monday the 2d of August (Anglico stilo), and intends to be at Calais on the 6th following, and so to pass with the first commodity. I humbly beseech your Honour to give order for his good reception, and that all those courtesies I have received here may be returned on him, which will assuredly cutertain all good correspondence. Your Honour will find him a discreet gentleman if I be not deceived, having no other acquaintance but a visit he gave me this day.

¹ See p. 108.

Herbert send a postscript about the plague :

The plague doth increase, but not much ; of 67,000 teeta or covered houses esteemed to be in this town, they account 300 only to be infected, which is but little in proportion ; yet because I have a great family, and that if (which God forbid) the plague should seize on any of them it would be too late to dislodge, I think fit to take the commodity of a fair house offered me in the country not far off.

In sending ^{24th July}
2d August to Naunton a report of the likelihood of further warfare between the supporters of the Queen-mother and Louis XIII (fol. 33), Herbert returns to the plague, which clearly caused him some anxiety :

The plague does increase here, but not much : yet the academics are dislodged, whose example I think to follow, unless it decreaseth or be in statu.

Herbert withdrew immediately to Montmorency's palace at Merlon, and thence reports to Naunton (fol. 35) the settlement of the civil disturbances in France (23d August).

There follow several letters of no great importance touching a misunderstanding which arose between Herbert and Sir Theodore de Mayerne, the well-known physician, (fol. 36-40). Mayerne had been engaged in some secret diplomacy in France in 1618, and had managed to offend the French King. He therefore asked Herbert to adjust their differences. But Herbert, taking the matter seriously, set inquiries on foot in both France and England as to what the nature of his offence had been ; and Mayerne complained to James I that Herbert had insulted him by taking for granted that he was in the wrong. Herbert declared (Sept.) to Naunton (fol. 41), that Mayerne had misunderstood him, and that he had secured full satisfaction for him at the French court. Mayerne was attending at the time Herbert's sister, probably Lady Jane of Abemarles, and Herbert wished 'to comfort him to look to my sick sister, who hath long been his patient', and 'to oblige him the more to procure her health'. At the same time Herbert was much harassed by the French demand for the extradition of Gantier and was anxious to learn 'whether his Majesty, on the example of Tyrone and Bothwell (whom France had refused to surrender) was being inclined to keep him in England still'. He asked for the removal of all ambiguity on this point (fol. 41). On 4th October 1619 he wrote a French note to M. de Puisieux, pointing out that James had never insisted on the extradition of Tyrone or Bothwell; and that he wished to know whether a reciproca lagreement were possible by which malefactors of the one country, who had taken refuge in the other, should be handed over to their own government (fol. 51). Finally, on 25 October (fol. 64), Herbert informed Naunton that the suit was relinquished by the French ministers.

¹ The French ambassador in London.

Another matter treated at length in Herbert's correspondence at this time (fol. 46-51), concerns one Pierre Hugon, who was believed to have stolen two coffers of jewels, belonging to the late Queen Anne, and to have entrusted them to the keeping of some French nobles. Hugon was in prison in England. At length Herbert obtained permission to break open the two trunks of Pierre Hugon 'remaining in the Hotel des Orisons at Paris, in the custody of Paris, servant to the Marquis de Trenelle'. He forwarded the inventory of their contents to Naunton (fol. 52-55) through his brother Henry, in October, and among the items were some of the missing jewels (fol. 64).

Herbert was an enthusiastic supporter of his friend the Elector-Palatine, and was very anxious that he should accept the perilous offer of the throne of Bohemia. On 9th September 1616 he wrote (fol. 47) that 'whether the Palatine will accept the offer', was the chief subject of discussion at the French court:

But God forbid he should refuse it, being the apparent way His Providence hath opened to the ruin of the Papacy. I hope therefore his Majesty will assist in this great work, having by the means of winter approaching time enough to resolve, and prepare by treaties and other ways against the next summer. For my part, most faithfully and willingly I offer both life and fortunes to serve his Majesty this or any way I may be of use.

On 29th September Herbert recurs to the subject (fol. 55):

For the business of Bohemia I understand this King hath written to the King my Master and to the Palatine to dissuade the acceptance of that crown, at which some of this court take occasion to laugh. In the meanwhile his Majesty and the Palatine's Highness may be assured they have here a great party, and which if this King be indifferent will be certainly much the stronger side. . . . I cannot believe a state so unsettled and tottering [as this] is ready yet to declare itself on either side: besides, it is extreme needy at this present, the King having stayed his journey to Chartres from Ambois a great while for want of money.

The Elector desired to maintain his friendship with Lord Herbert and on 21st October (fol. 64), the latter writes to Naunton:

I must acquaint your Honour that during my stay at Compiègne¹, I received a letter from the Palatine's Highness, wherein his Highness was pleased to advertise me that the Elector of Treves (or Trier) would shortly come in person to this King: that his business was to accuse the Palatine's Highness for taking arms and disturbing the public peace; to which his Highness desires me to answer: That (when there was on other consideration) he and the princes of the union were obliged to it for the defence of their countries, being so near unto Bohemia: that the ecclesiasties could not allege any such reason; that, therefore, in them it was unjust to take arms, but in himself and the rest necessary: so that in general his Highness wishes me to do him all good offices in this court, and particularly to present the many helps and courtesies this King's father received from his Highness's predecessors upon all occasions, assuring me in conclusion that his Majesty would approve well any service I could do his Highness in this kind. That which first occurred upon reading this letter, that I wanted instructions from his Majesty to treat in this business, yet when I considered, what and for whom I should speak, I recollected myself, and went immediately unto the King's principal ministers, the Chancellor, Monsieur le Guardesteau, and President Jannin, where, after I had protested that what I had to say was only in the name of the Palgrave's Highness, without that I had any such command from the King my master, I repeated his Highness's letter in substance, as I related that now: but found them wholly inclined to believe that his Highness had some further intention, and that the raising of those forces was to make himself King of Bohemia, insomuch that admitting the kingdom to be elective, which indeed they granted, they would needs argue by what right the Bohemians could depose Ferdinand. To which I answered that I had no commission to treat so far, yet that I had seen diverse copies of their motives: that, among many others, Ferdinand had treated with the King of Spain to make that kingdom hereditary to the House of Austria; that, besides, he was never lawfully elected. In conclusion, after a long debate, I brought them to this, that they promised to advise with the King my master before they resolved on anything in the business, which was all I could expect to have obtained by the conference. Howsoever, at worst I hope his Majesty will find this state so unaffected and neutral, that if not their resolution, yet at least their irresolution will keep them indifferent: and that is enough, since whensoever his Majesty shall resolve to comfort the Palatine's Highness to the acceptance of this offered crown, his Majesty may be assured of many servants and honourers in this country that will voluntarily offer their lives in the quarrel.

¹ He had visited the court there.

On 31st October 1619, Herbert sends in a bill 'for secret services' including 'intelligences, and conveyance of letters', to the amount of £340 (fol. 66); and on 5th November a bill for his 'late travelling between Merlou, Compiègne, and Champagne' amounting to £400 (fol. 69). On 4th November he implores James I to send instructions concerning his behaviour towards the embassy coming to Paris from Treves and from the Emperor to complain of the Elector Palatine. He declares that 'his heart is as much affected to the advancement of his Highness's cause as any whosoever' (fol. 68). On 24th November he writes that the Protestants are growing rebellious in Bearn, and that France is not likely to interfere in German affairs. But he adds, 'the French do all their business in compliment, the outward sense and meaning being only the cipher and dead letter of their intentions'.

For my part, I have many reasons to induce me to believe they will be neutral: wherein I may come from words to more evident testimonies. I find this state first too poor, and then too unsettled to stir. Their poverty appears in that they have taken up three-fourths of a year's rent beforehand; that they lay new impositions upon the people, that faint under the old; that they expect from the Parisians a great sum of money (they say 300,000 crowns) as the price of the court's removing to this place (i.e. Paris), though the contagion (God be thanked for it) seems to be in a manner extinguished. And for their unsettledness, it is such as, when the King would send an army, I think they know not whom to trust.

On 23rd November (fol. 73) Herbert sent an enthusiastic letter in French to the new King of Bohemia (fol. 73), expressing his own sympathy with him, and his belief that France would not join the Emperor against him. On 3rd December he told Naunton (fol. 74) that he was forming a strong party in the Elector's behalf among the French nobility, and that if the French King remained neutral the German Protestants might count on many ardent volunteers from France. But complaints were being made that the Roman Catholics 'were worse used than ever' in both England and Germany. On the $\frac{14}{24}$ December (fol. 77) Herbert states that this

King hath at last appointed the $\frac{10}{20}$ of January for the solemnity of the oath of alliance betwixt the two crowns '—a ceremony which had been repeatedly postponed, but to take part in which Herbert had originally been sent from England. Monsieur Puisieux said that 'it was expected I should put myself into an extraordinary equipage for the great solemnity'. The French still hesitated with regard to Bohemia, and Herbert asked for fuller instructions.

On 30th December Herbert described (fol. 83) some hot disputes current at the French court and the rising discontent of the French Protestants; but the approaching ceremony chiefly occupied his mind, and he was anxious to be treated with extraordinary honour.

The oath of alliance is to be solemnised the 20th of this month (new style), for which day, unless your Honour allow me the title of an Extraordinary Ambassador, they will diminish the outward ceremony of respect they gave in their last. I have therefore, by that extraordinary commission I had for that purpose, suffered them for that only day to receive me in the quality of an Extraordinary Ambassador, and in truth have already put myself into an equipage altogether extraordinary. I send your Honour the oath; if your Honour dislike anything, I beseech your Honour to advertise me. I will hope to prolong the solemnity to three or four days' further, which will be a sufficient time, if your Honour please to send me word, which I beseech your Honour not to fail; for I am unwilling to proceed in anything for which I have not good warrant. But I think there will be no difficulty to suffer them to give me the respect of an Extraordinary Ambassador for one day. If I hear not from your Honour in a reasonable time I will proceed, for now they call on me. So hoping your Honour will not omit to let me hear from your Honour in this business with all possible speed.

On 31st December Herbert reviewed the attitude of France as to foreign affairs in a long and able letter to James I (fol. 85-8). He urged Naunton at the same time (fol. 89) to lead the King to announce his own policy as one interested in the cause of the newly elected King of Bohemia. The French ministers refused to tell him the result of their negotiations with Furstemburg, the special ambassador from the Emperor, on the ground that the King of England made no communication of his intentions to their master. Herbert, however, saw that Louis was inclining to the side of the Catholics, and that the German dispute was coming to be regarded as a great religious quarrel (fol. 89). The arrangements for the solemn signature of the treaty of alliance were proceeding apace, and he was sparing no expense to array himself to best advantage (fol. 91). He writes to Naunton, 8th January 1619-20:

Our ceremony goes on, and it is now too late at this present to recall my disbursements, having already (indiscreetly enough) put myself so far into the equipage of an Ambassador Extraordinary that your Honour I think will hear no man was ever beyond me. But I confess I found it necessary at this time to oblige the people even by extraordinary shows to the solemnity, and due respect of this great alliance betwixt the two crowns, besides that I was in plain terms told that unless the same pomp were observed on our side we must not expect it on theirs. Wherein they did insinuate that it was a favour, that from an ambassador ordinary they did accept me in the quality of an extraordinary (even for one day) though at last they concluded my commission apart did oblige them to it. These considerations made me enter into great expense; and howsoever I shall never repent to have become my place in the best fashion I could. For the rest, I believe that if his Majesty be pleased to consider what an Ambassador Extraordinary would have cost by itself, my reckoning will be thought very easy.

On $\frac{13}{23}$ January 1619-20 Herbert reported that military preparations were being made, whether or no to assist the Emperor he did not know, but the Duc de Guise had said to him that if the King of Bohemia's cause was a good one, James I would have publicly declared for it. The formal ceremony was deferred till 2nd February (new style) 'for (it was stated) the more solemnity' (fol. 93); but public policy in France was clearly very vacillating (fol. 95). On 27th January Herbert describes the performance of a preliminary part of the solemnity with much self-satisfaction (fol. 97).

The oath of alliance betwixt the two crowns was performed on Sunday last, in the Church of the Feuillans, with all solemnity. They would have much diminished the ceremony, as doubting whether I was honoured with such an extraordinary commission as was capable of it. But upon better perusal of my commission they thought good to make it public in the church, as when my Lord Wotton was here, and this being the reallest I thought I need not insist upon some less essential forms. In the fashion I appeared in, the opinion is, no man exceeded me of the most extraordinary that have been here; which I did the rather to meet with their objections. I shall take the boldness to write to his Majesty concerning the same business whereof my last advertised his Majesty, but have not herein desired his gracious pleasure, so that I will beseech your Honour to obtain it, which I do I protest for no other end but that the honour may remain to my posterity of serving his Majesty though but for one day, in the quality of an Ambassador Extraordinary. If your honour be pleased to use my most noble Lord the Marquis of Buckingham herein, I am sure his Lordship will be pleased to remember the honour his Majesty did me on this occasion.

On $\frac{20}{30}$ January 1619-20 Herbert sends to the King a copy of a letter from Louis to the Emperor, to which he had secretly obtained access. He points out that the French King is not sending succours to the German Catholics, but merely desires 'to weigh the Emperor's propositions' ¹.

On 3rd February 1619-20 Herbert returns to the question of his status (fol. 100).

And now for my quality during the ceremony, I hope your Honour knows how far I was from presuming, though it were the subject for which I was once designed extraordinary, and which (since they had no other allegation why they should diminish that ceremony) I hoped I might most humbly desire his Majesty to confirm as a favour heretofore conferred upon me, in which since I beseech your Honour most particularly that his Majesty may understand me.

¹ A copy of this letter is also in MS. Harl., 1581, f. 13.

On 18th February 1619-20, Herbert renews his desire for precise instructions with regard to Bohemian affairs, complains that James I had, without considering his dignity, been answering the current charges brought against him by continental politicians of having instigated his son-in-law to act on the offensive, and that popular feeling in France was inclining against the Elector-Palatine; although Herbert's own affection for him was unchanged (fol. 100). On 21st February 1619-20, he writes that the relations between Louis XIII and his Protestant subjects were very critical, and that Gondomar had arrived in Paris in the hope of preserving peace in Europe (fol. 100). On 25th February he perceives that the Bohemian cause is in jeopardy. 'All I have to comfort me, next God's providences', Herbert writes, 'is his Majesty's wisdom, which I assure myself will temper all for the best'.

With these words the letter-book comes to an end. The only other letter of this period with which I have met is one in MS., Harl. 1581, fol. 11, addressed by Herbert to Buckingham from Merlon, 1st October 1609, in which he first broaches a marriage between Henrietta Maria and Prince Charles.

Since my writing this other, I understood the King passed near this place, on his way to Compiègne in Picardy. They made me repair to court, where I visited only M. de Luynes, who, among other speeches, told me they had given instructions to their ambassador in England, that if there were any overture made of a match for our Prince with Madame Henriette the king's sister, that it should be received with all honour and affection; and (if I be not mistaken in the meaning of his words) said, so much was already insinuated by their said ambassador.

I answered them as civilly as I could, having no instructions to speak of any such thing, and came to the business of Bohemia, wherein I desired to know how his master stood affected. He told me that he had not yet leisure to consider the consequences, and that he first desired to hear how the King my master did declare himself. I told him his Majesty did advise what was to be done, that in the meanwhile he did protest that when he sent his ambassador to compose the differences of the empire, that he knew nothing of the Palatine's election to the kingdom of Bohemia, or that there was any such design. That besides his Majesty's protestation, which was an argument above all that could be made to the contrary, there were many reasons to persuade that even the Palatine's Highness himself knew nothing of any such intention; as, first, the unanimity of consent in the Bohemians, which argues there was no faction or labouring of voices; secondly, the necessity, since they could not tell where else to put themselves under protection; thirdly, that if it had been the Palatine's Highness's desire, that certainly he would have used both that and other means to prevent the election of King Ferdinand to the Empire. This was the effect of the reasons I gave, to which I added that, howsoever the King my master did resolve, I hoped at least his master would be indifferent—that they had no greatness to fear but that of the House of Austria; that they might take the time to recover the countries detained from them; that lastly, there was no other way, as matters now stand, to establish the peace of Christendom, since he might be sure the untamed Germans would never submit themselves to others. He, which seemed to hearken more to my reasons than to answer them, told me all these matters should be referred to the King's being at Compiegne, whither he desired me to come, which I promised; as having the business of the King's renewing his oath, to require. I have written these particularities to Mr. Secretary Naunton, and attend your Lordship's further commandments.

The postscript runs :

M. de Luynes doth much desire to hold correspondence with your Lordship, and desired me to tell your Lordship so much. I should be glad to have leave to use a little compliment to him on your Lordship's part.

On ¹⁴/₂₄ August 1620, Herbert returns to the theme in a letter to the King (MSS. Harl. f. 15):

Le Buisson is returned, and, as Monsieur Le Prince did tell me, hath made a proposition to your sacred Majesty concerning a marriage betwixt his Highness and Madame Henriette, to which, he said, your sacred Majesty did answer, that your sacred Majesty did desire it too, but that your sacred Majesty was so far engaged with Spain that your sacred Majesty could not treat thereof. This Monsieur Le Prince told me, and I thought it my duty to let your sacred Majesty know the report; on which occasion, I cannot omit to tell your sacred Majesty that the match is generally desired by this nation, and particularly by Madame herself, who hath not only cast out many words to this purpose, but, when there hath been question of diversity of religions, hath said, that a wife ought to have no will but that of her husband's; which words I confess have incited me to do her this good office. In the rest, being so far from having a voice that I will not so much as have a thought which is not warranted by your sacred Majesty's authority, which I hold in that infinite reverence that I am sorry I can say no more than that I will live and die your sacred Majesty's most obedient, most loyal, and most affectionate subject and servant,

HERBERT.

On 15th February 1620-1 Herbert described in a letter to the King the coming war with the French Protestants, and the plan of attack adopted by the King in council. Luynes, he stated, was in favour of peace, and his 'averseness from entering into any war at home' would probably delay its outbreak. Herbert suggested that Luynes foresaw 'that his enemies who dare not show themselves in time of peace will not fear to declare themselves in time of war'.

Among the Egerton MSS. No. 2598, are a few letters addressed by Herbert to Lord Doncaster, Earl of Carlisle. In the first (fol. 173), dated 24th July 1620, Herbert describes the French people thus :

This is a nation tied by no rules, and therefore there is nothing else can be affirmed of them ; yet, in this irregularity, they will want neither example or excuse. If we compare them to those things which corrupt, wanting motion ; in the perpetual inconstancy and unquietness whereof they have left it more doubtful whether they will make either war or peace, at this present.

On $\frac{17}{27}$ October 1620 Herbert describes to Doncaster (fol. 254) the visit of Louis XIII to Bearn, and his cold reception there by the disaffected Protestants.

During his temporary withdrawal in 1621 Doncaster took Herbert's place at Paris. When Herbert was returning in 1622 to the French court, he writes to Doncaster to thank him for having smoothed the way for him :

It is not a work of Fortune that I am put into your Lordship's hands. For, to have put me into your Lordship's hands, were to have put me out of her own. It is therefore a higher Providence, which, foreseeing the disposition I have ever had to honour and serve your Lordship, would as well give me all just occasion for it ; On these terms I can nothing doubt of the success of mine or any affair, while, for being undertaken by these hands, I can do no less, than most humbly desire, as soon as possibly, to kiss them ¹.

After Herbert's return to Paris in December 1621, little of his correspondence is extant. On hearing that Doncaster was coming to Paris to excuse Prince Charles's and Buckingham's hasty passage through France on their way to Spain, Herbert wrote (Egerton MS. 2574, fol. 165) :

Meeting so fit an opportunity, I would not fail to put your Lordship in mind with how much and true devotion I accompany your Lordship's journey, and withal give your Lordship notice that the Marquis Spinola is departed from Bruxelles, his cannon marching towards the Palatinat ; whither it is certainly believed he will lead his forces.

The letter is dated from Paris, 20th August 1622.

When Doncaster had left Paris to follow the Prince into Spain, Herbert writes (Egerton MS. 2595, fol. 181) (23rd March 1622-3) :

¹ From London, and not Paris, this $\frac{16}{26}$ April 1622.

Your Lordship's letters of exchange I delivered Mr. Langherae, who hath sent them after your Lordship, to Bordeaux ; your Lordship's present hath been delivered to the King, who seemed much to esteem it. Your Lordship must have heard before now of the death of the good President Januin.

The postscript runs :

I desire infinitely to hear the success of his Highness' journey, whom God bless, but know not how far I may presume of your Lordship's leisure.

The last extant letter written during his embassy was addressed by Herbert to the King, and disscussed the opinions held in France of the Spanish marriage treaty after the failure of the negotiations :

MY MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN,—Now that I thank God for it, his Highness, according to my continual prayers, hath made a safe and happy return unto your sacred Majesty's presence, I think myself bound, by way of complete obedience to those commandments I received from your sacred Majesty, both by Mr. Secretary Calvert and my brother Henry, to give your sacred Majesty an account of that sense which the general sort of people doth entertain here, concerning the whole frame and context of his Highness' voyage. It is agreed on all parts that his Highness must have received much contentment in seeing two great kingdoms, and consequently in enjoying that satisfaction which princes but rarely, and not without great peril obtain. His Highness' discretion, diligence, and princely behaviour everywhere, likewise is much praised. Lastly, since his Highness' journey hath fallen out so well, that his Highness is come back without any prejudice to his person or dignity : they say the success hath sufficiently commended the council. This is the most common censure (even of the bigot party, as I am informed) which I approve in all but in the last point, in the delivery whereof I find something to dislike, and therefore tell them, that things are not to be judged alone by the success, and that when they would not look so high as God's providence, without which no place is secure, they might find even in reason of state so much as might sufficiently warrant his Highness' person, and liberty to return.

I will come from the ordinary voice, to the selecter judgment of the ministers of state, and more intelligent people in this kingdom, who, though they nothing vary from the above-recited opinion, yet as more profoundly looking into the state of this long-treated-of alliance betwixt your sacred Majesty and Spain in the persons of his Highness and the Infanta, they comprehend their sentence thereof (as I am informed) in three propositions :

First, That the protestation, which the King of Spain made to his Highness upon his departure, whereby he promised to chase away, and disfavour all those who should oppose this marriage, doth extend no further, than to the said king's servants, or at furthest, not beyond the temporal princes his neighbours, so that the Pope, being not included herein, it is thought his consent must be yet obtained, and consequently that the business is in little more forwardness than when it first began.

Secondly, That the Pope will never yield his consent, unless your sacred Majesty grant some notable privileges and advantage to the Roman Catholic religion in your sacred Majesty's kingdoms.

Thirdly, That the said King of Spain would never insist upon obtaining those privileges, but that he more desires to form a party in your sacred Majesty's kingdoms, which he may keep always obsequious to his will, than to maintain a friendly correspondence betwixt your sacred Majesty and himself. I must not, in the last place, omit to acquaint your sacred Majesty very particularly with the sense which was expressed by the bons François and body of those of the Religion, who heartily wish that the same greatness which the King of Spain doth so affect over all the world, and still maintains even in this country, which is to be protector of the Jesuited and bigot party, your sacred Majesty would embrace being Defender of our Faith. The direct answer to which though I evade, and therefore reply little more than that this council was much fitter when the Union in Germany did subsist than at this time; yet do I think myself obliged to represent the affection they bear unto your sacred Majesty. This is as much as is come to my notice, concerning that point your sacred Majesty gave me in charge, which therefore I have plainly laid open before your sacred Majesty's eyes, as understanding well, that princes never receive greater wrong than when the ministers they put in trust do palliate and disguise those things which it concerns them to know. For the avoiding whereof, let me take the boldness to assure your sacred Majesty that those of this King's Council here will use all means they can, both to the King of Spain, and to the Pope (in whom they pretend to have very particular interest) not only to interrupt but if it be possible to break off your sacred Majesty's alliance with Spain. For which purpose the Count de Tillicres hath strict command to give either all punctual advice, that accordingly they may proceed. It rests that I most humbly beseech your Sacred Majesty to take my free relation of these particulars in good part, since I am of no faction, nor have any passion or interest, but faithfully to perform that service and duty which I owe to your sacred Majesty, for whose perfect health and happiness I pray, with the devotion of your sacred Majesty's Most obedient, most loyal, and most affectionate subject and servant,

HERUERT¹.

From MERLOU CASTLE, the 31st of October 1623. Stil. No.

The Princess Elizabeth's gratitude to Herbert for his devotion to her cause is shown in the following undated letter which she addressed to him from the Hague:—'I pray be assured that my being in childbed hath hindered me all this while from thanking you for your letter, and no forgetfulness of mine to you to whom I have ever had obligations from your love, which I will ever acknowledge and seek to requite in what I can.'—Warner's Epistolary Curiosities.

¹ Printed in The Cabala, p. 231, and Ellis's Original Letters, 1st ser., iii, 1636.

INDEX

- ABBEVILLE, 102
 Abemarle, Lady Jane of, 194
 Abergavenny, 8 and n., 75
 Aberystwith, Castle of, 4 n.
Acr, 39 and n.
 Ainorant, Monsieur, 125
 Albemarle, Duke of. See Monk.
 Alfieri, 43 n.
 Algiers, 13 and n.
 Alice of Llanowell, 170
 Alnwick, 146
 Amadis de Gaul, 6 and n.
 Ambois, 195
 Amiens, 102
 Amsterdam, Pharmacopœia of, 29
 and n.
 Andrews, 129
 Anglesea, 7, 22
 Anne of Austria, 105 and n., 114,
 115, 124
 Anne, Queen of Denmark, 68 and n., 69 and n., 102
 Antwerp, 68
 Areskin or Erskine, Sir James, 64
 and n., 67, 186
 Aristotle, xxv., 32
 Arnauld, Antoine de la Mothe, 118
 n., 123
 Ascham, Roger, quoted, 25 n.
 Asti, treaty of, 95 n.
 Aston, 5 n.
 Aston, Sir Walter, 125 and n.
 Astrology, 27 and n.
 Athletics, 37-42
 Aubrey, John, quoted, 161 n.
 Augsburg, 81
Aurora Medicorum, 30 and n., 31
 Ayres, Lady, xv., 73
 Ayres, Sir John, 69-74, 76

 BACON, FRANCIS, 26 n., 27 n., 141, 181
 Balagni, Count, xiv., 57 and n.
 61-2, 65, 107
 Baldwin, Timothy, 142 and n.
 Baltimore, Lord. See Calvert, Sir George.
 Banbury, battle near, 6, 8 n.
 Barker, John, of Hamon, 50
 Basle, 94
 Bassetts of Beaupré, 173
 Bath, Knighthood of the, 44 and n.,
 45 and n.
 Bauderon, Brice, 30 and n.
 Bavaria, Duke of, 137
 Baxter, Richard, on Herbert's philosophy, xxxiv.
 Bayonne, 129
 Beaumaris, 74
 Beaumont, Sir Thomas, 181
 Bedford, Earl of, 70 n.
 Bedford, Lucy, Countess of, 70 and n., 112 and n.
 Beinerton, 11 n.
 Benille, P., 191
 Berenger, Richard, quoted on horses, 37 n.
 Bergen-op-Zoom, 11 and n.
 Betune, M., 183
 Blackhall, 4
 Blaenllyfni, 170
 Blount, Charles, the Deist, xxxiv.
 Bohemia, an inland or maritime country? 105 and n.
 Bohemia, King of. See Frederick,
 Elector-Palatine.
 Bohemia, Queen of. See Elizabeth,
 Electress-Palatine.
 Bologna, 84
 Bonville, Lord, 8 n.
 Boswell, William, 106 n.
 Bothwell, 194
 Boulogne, 128
 Bourbon, François de, 57 n.
 Bouteville, Monsieur de, 107
 Brandenburg, Elector of, 76 n.
 Braose, William de, 170
 Brereton, Sir William, 149, 152,
 155, 156, 157
 Bresne, Comte de, 191

- Bridgewater, Earl of, 160
 Brill, the, 96 and n.
 Bristol, John Digby, Earl of, 125 and n.
 Bromley, Sir Thomas, 9 and n., 15 n.
 Brooke, Lord (Robert Greville), a philosopher, xxxiv. n.
 Brown, Sir John (husband of Lord Herbert's sister Frances), 15, 43 n.
 Bruce, Lord, of Kinloss, 90 n., 180, 181
 Brussels, 68, 81, 96, 125, 126
 Buckingham, Duke of. See Villiers.
 Buckley, 106
 Burgoine, 88
 Burlamachi, Philip, 101 and n.
 Burleigh House, near Stamford, 44 and n.
 Bussy d'Amboise, 57 n.
 Byron, John, first Lord, 289.

 CAAGE, THOMAS, probably a wrong transcription for Carew, Thomas (q.v.)
Cabrioles, 39 and n.
 Cadenet, Marquis de, 121 n.
 Caremion, 2 n.
 Calais, 48, 68, 97, 102
 Calvert, Sir George, 95 and n., 188, 202
Cambria, Powell's Historie of, 174 n.
 Carew, Sir George, 48 and n.
 Carew, Thomas, xx. n., 102 n.
 Carleton, Sir Dudley, 82, 85, 87 n., 124 n., 125
 Carlisle, Earl of. See Hay, James.
Caros, 21 and n.
 Cary, Sir Henry, first Viscount Falkland, 72 and n.
 Cary, Lucius, second Viscount Falkland, 72 n.
 Casaubon, Isaac, 56 and n.
 Castle-Island (Kerry), barony of, conferred on Herbert, 138, 140
 Catherine, Queen of Aragon, 172
 Cecil, Lady Diana, 82 n.
 Cecil, Sir Edward, 12, 61, 63 and n., 66, 79, 140, 183 and n.
 Cenis, Mont, 86
Chamaedrys, 24 and n.
Chamaepitys, 24 and n.
 Chamberlain, quoted, 51 n., 181
 Chandos, Lord, 60 and n., 61, 163, 181
 Chantilly, 52, 54
 Chapman, George, 182
 Charlecote (Warwickshire), 58 n.
 Charles I., xxii., 138, 140, 141, 142-147, 148, 150, 157, 199, 202
 Charles, Prince of Wales, 126, 128-130, 131, 132, 136, 137, 201
 Charles V., 55
 Chartres, 195
 Châtillon, Monsieur de, 62 n., 79, 185
 Châtre, Marshal de la, 60 and n.
 Cheek, Sir Hatton, 180
 Chelsea, 10 n.
 Cherbury, 5 n., 142, 162
 Chester, 148, 152, 156
 Chirbury. See Cherbury
 Chirk Castle, 149
 Chrestienne, Madame, 187
 Christianity, Lord Herbert's view of, xxvii.-xxix.
 Churchyard, Thomas, quoted, 7 n., 21 n.
 Cicero, De Oratore, 36
 Cleves, 60, 76 n., 180
 Cleves, Duke of, 60 n.
 Clifford, Anne, 68 n.
 Cognac, 120, 121
 Coke, Sir Edward, 182
 Colebrook, 6, 76
 Collier, Jeremy, 182 and n.
 Cologne, 81
 Comenius, John Amos, 25 and n.
 Compiègne, 195, 199, 200
 Condé, Prince of, 107, 115, 129
 Con'ers, Sir John, 8 n.
 Contarini, Signior, 125
 Conti, Princess of, xiv., 57 and n., 59, 105, 114, 118
 Conway, Sir Edward, 96 and n.
 Corbet, family of (Ancestors of Lord Herbert), 10
 Corbet, John, 2
 Cordus, Valerius, 30 and n.
Cortine, 61 and n.
 Cottingham, Francis, Lord, 125, 128 and n., 181 n.
 Cotton, Sir George, 45 n.
 Cotton, Mary (Lady Kent), 45 n.
 Cotton, Sir Robert, 180
Courbelles, 39 and n.
 Coventry, 157
 Cowbridge, 173
 Cremonini, Cesare, 84 and n.
 Croft, Sir Edward, 72 n.
 Croft, Sir Herbert, 72 and n.
 Croft, Sir James, 44 and n. 73 n.
 Crofts, Jane, 9 n.
 Crofts, Mr., 106
 Crofts, Sir Richard, 9 n.

- Cromwell, Thomas, 172, 173
 Crook, Lady, 73
 Crosse, William, 62 and n., 77 n.
 Crouy, Duke of, 126
 Culverwel, Nathaniel, xxxiii., xxxiv.
 Cumberland, Earl of, 68 n.
 Curzon, Sir George, 90 n.
 Curzon, Mary, 90 n.
- DALTON, Sir Thomas, 180
 Dancing, 37
 Danvers, Sir John of Dauntsey, 10 n.
 Danvors, Sir John, xix., 10 n., 113 and n., 161 n.
 Davers, Sir John. See Danvers
De Causis Errorum, xxvii. n.
De Religione Gentilium, xxvii. and n., quoted, xxviii. n., 27 n., 158
De Veritate, xxv., 133, 134 and n., 144 and n., 147, 158, 161
 Dee, Dr. John, 22 n.
 Della Casa, 42 n.
 Denmark, 11
 Descartes' opinion of Herbert's philosophy, xxxv.
 Devereux, family of (ancestors of Lord Herbert), 10
 Diddlebury, in Shropshire, 21 n.
 Dieppe, 58
 Digby, Everard, quoted, 41 n.
 Dinas, castle of, 170
 Diodati, xxxv., 158 n.
 Disancourt, Monsieur de, 52, 54, 55, 102
 Dispensatory, by Gesner, 31 and n.
 Dolguog, 5, 29 n.
 Doncaster, Viscount. See Hay, James.
 Doune, Dr. John, xix., xx. n., 10 and n., 11 n., 21 n., 175-178, 178-9
 Dorset, fourth Earl of (Edward Sackville), xvi., 68 n., 90 and n., 91-2, 180
 Dorset, third Earl of (Richard), 68 and n.
 Dorset, first Earl of (Thomas Saekville), 90 n.
 Dorset House, 68
 Dover, 48, 68, 102, 128
 Dreux, battle of, 49 n.
 Dudley, Sir Robert, 84 and n.
 Dudson, 31 n.
 Duels and duelling, 40, 62-67, 179-182
 Dugdale, Sir William, xxxiii., 6 n., 9 n., 167 n.
 Dumoulin, Sieur, 122 and n.
 Dunkirk, 97
 Dusseldorf, 66, 67
- EDMONDES, Sir Thomas, 57 n., 139
 Edward IV., xix., 6 n., 7 n.
 Edward VI., 3
 Edgecote, 8 and n.
 Edgehill, battle of, 6 and n.
 Education, Lord Herbert's views on, xxx, 23-43
 Eilion, David, 6 n.
 Elector-Palatine. See Frederick, Elector-Palatine.
 Elizabeth, Princess (Electress-Palatine), xvii., xxiii., 87 n., 94, 125 n., 136, 137, 180 and n., 203
 Elizabeth, Queen, xiii., xxiv., 44
 Emerson, 97, 98
 Enimerich, 77
 Erccall (seat of Newports), 15 n.
 Ernelly, Sir Michael, 155, 156
 Erskine, Sir James. See Areskin.
 Essex, Robert Devereux, second Earl of, 43 and n., 96 n.
 Essex, Robert Devereux, third Earl of (the Parliamentary general), 150, 181
 Estampes, 110
 Exeter, Thomas Cecil, first Earl of, 12 n.
 Exeter, William Cecil, second Earl of, 82 n.
 Eyton, 15 and n., 20, 22
- FAIRFAX, Sir William, 156
 Fairfax, Lord, 153 and n.
 Falkland, Lord. See Cary.
 Fencing, 38 and n.
 Ferdinand II., 84 n., 200
 Fernelius Johannes, 30 and n.
 Ferrara, 84
 Finet or Finnet, Sir John, 88 and n., 181 n.
 Fitz-Herbert, Herbert, 167
 FitzHugh, Lord, 8 n.
 Florence, 82
 Fowler of the Grange, 76
 Fox, Ann, 4 n.
 Fox, Charles, of Bromfield, 4 n.
 Francis I., 55
 Franklin, Benjamin, quoted, xi.
 Frascati, 83

- Frederick, Elector Palatine and King of Bohemia, xvii., xviii., 81, 136, 137, 194-197, 199-200
 Fugglestone, 11 n.
 Furstenberg, Count, 197
- GABELET, MOUNT, 88
 Gaellac, Monsieur, 132
Galathea de Moribus, 42 and n.
 Galen, 30
 Gambling, 42
 Gassendi, xxxv., 158 and n.
 Gautier, 194
 Geneva, 94, 125
 Genoa, 86 n.
 Gesner, Conrad, 31 and n.
 Glendower, Owen, 171
 Gondomar, Count de, 126-128, 199
 Grafton, the chronicle, 6 and n.
 Gravelines, 97
 Gravesend, 102
 Greek, study of, 25
 Greenwich, 50, 51
 Grey, family of (ancestors of Lord Herbert), 10
 Griffith, Margaret, wife of Sir Richard Herbert of Colebrook, 8 n.
 Griffith, Sir Rice, 8 n., 172
 Griffith, Thomas, 8 n.
 Griffiths, Richard, of Sutton, xvi., 28, 75-6, 113
 Grimes, Mr., 128
 Grotius, Hugo, xxv., 132, 133 n.
 Guardesteau, Monsieur le, 195
 Guarthelow, 31 n.
 Guazzo, Stefano, La Civil Conversatione, 42 and n.
 Gueretin, Monsieur, 125
 Guiliana, 86 n.
 Guiseardi, Signior, 125
 Guise, Duke of, 57 n., 116 and n., 131, 198
 Güttler, Dr. C., xxvii. n.
- HAG, James, 191
 Halyburton, Thomas, xxiv.
 Hall, Edward, the chronicle, 6 and n., 8 n.
 Hamilton, Lieut., 67
 Hamilton, Sir William, xxvi n., xxvii. n.
 Harjuin, Phil., 27 n.
 Harlech, Castle of, 6 and n., 7 n.
 Harley, Sir Robert, xvi., 73 and n., 98
 Hastings, Lord Francis, 98 n.
- Hay, James, Viscount, Doncaster and Earl of Carlisle, 122 and n., 123, 130 n., 131 and n., 135 and n., 181, 200-202
 Hearne, quoted, 182 n.
 Heath, James, 154
 Hedgecote Field, 170
 Heidelberg, 81, 87
 Henly, Andrew, of Basel, 111 and n.
 Henrietta Maria, 126 and n., 132, 134 n., 136, 137, 199
 Henri IV. of France, xiv., 49 n., 56 and n., 57 n., 60 and n., 103-104 and n., 105 and n., 108, 109, 118-121, 171, 179
 Heury I., 167
 Henry VI., 8 n.
 Henry VII., 6 n., 143, 172
 Henry VIII., 6, 9 n., 142, 145, 172
 Henry, Prince of Wales, poems on, xxxvi. n.
 Herbert, early history of family of, after Lord Herbert's death, 163
 Herbert, family of (St. Julian's), 47, 171
 Herbert of Gower and Chepstow, Charles Somerset, Lord, 9 n.
 Herbert, Adam, 170
 Herbert, Alicia (Lord Herbert's granddaughter), 161 n.
 Herbert, Ann (aunt of Lord Herbert), 4 n.
 Herbert, Lady Anne, 3 and n.
 Herbert, Arabella (Lord Herbert's granddaughter), 161 n.
 Herbert, Beatrice (Lord Herbert's daughter), 23, 46 and n., 153, 160
 Herbertus, Camerarius, 167
 Herbert, Charles (uncle of Lord Herbert), 5 and n.
 Herbert, Charles (brother of Lord Herbert), 10, 11 and n.
 Herbert, Christina, 170
 Herbert, Edward (Lord Herbert's grandfather), 2, 3 and n., 4 and n., 5 and n., 15 n., 173
 Herbert, Edward, first Lord Herbert of Cherbury—his vanity, xi., his avowed object in writing his life, xii.; his career at court, xiii.; his lack of veracity, xviii.; his later life, xxiii.-xxiv.; his political temperament, xxiv.; his philosophy, xxv.-xxvii.; his theory of truth, xxvi.; his religious opinions, xxvii.-xxix.; his critics, xxxiii.-xxxvi.; his poetry, xxxvi.-xxxviii.; his History of Henry VIII., xxxviii.-xxxix.; his prose style, xxxix.; his ancestry: 1-9, 167-171; his mother, brothers, and sisters, 9-15; born at Eyton, 15; his infancy, 15; his first education, 19-21; goes to Oxford, 21; marries his cousin, 22-23; his notions on education, 23-43; his knowledge of medicine, 28-32; his love of botany, 31; his horsemanship, 39-41; removes to London, 43; is presented to Queen Elizabeth, 44; is made Knight of the Bath, 44; his children, 46; goes to Paris, 48; visits Montmorency at Merlou, 48; offers to fight his first duel, 49; his challenges, 50-52; hunts at Merlou, 53; visits Chantilly, 54; sees Casaubon at Paris, 56; goes to the Tuileries, 56; meets M. de Balagni, 57, 61-62; is nearly shipwrecked off Dover, 58; has his portrait painted, xv. and n., 60 and n.; 68 and n.; goes to the Low Countries, 60; acts bravely at the siege of Juliers, 62-62; quarrels with Lord Howard of Walden, 62, 66, 182-186; visits the Earl of Dorset, 68; is favoured by Queen Anne, 68, 69; his liaison with Lady Ayres, 69-70; is assaulted by Sir John Ayres, 70-75; saves Richard Griffiths' life, 75-6; returns to the Low Countries, 76; challenges the Spaniards, 80; interviews Spínola, 81; goes to Cologne, 81; to Switzerland, 82; to Italy, 82-85; visits the Duke of Savoy, 86; is kindly received by an innkeeper's wife, 87-8; visits an innkeeper's beautiful daughter, 88-9; reaches Lyons, 89; is arrested, 90; is released by the aid of Sir Edward Sackville, 91-2; challenges the governor of Lyons, 92-94; meets the Duke of Montmorency, 93; visits Geneva, 94; goes to the Low Countries, 95; returns to England, 95-98; is appointed ambassador at Paris, 99; is insulted, 99-100; encounters Sir Robert Vaughan, 100-101; leaves England, 102; settles in Paris, 103; presents himself to Louis

XIII. at Tours, 103; and to the Queen, 105; flies from the plague at Paris to Merlou, 107; quarrels with the Spanish ambassador about precedence, 109-110; gets the better of him, 110; visits Lesdiguères, 111; grows taller, 111-2; his mode of life, 112; has a pulse in his head, 113; his sweetness of body, 113; amuses himself in Paris, 113-115; defends James I.'s character, 115; talks with the Duc de Guise, 116; seeks to prevent war being made on the French Protestants, 118-9; quarrels with M. de Luynes, 119; visits the scene of battle, 120; returns to England, 122; is justified by James I., 123; goes to Paris again, 123 and n.; is welcomed, 124; his intercourse with his fellow-ambassadors, 124-5; insists on the justice of the Elector-Palatine's cause, 126; meets Gondomar, 127; hears of Prince Charles's visit to Spain, 128-130; discusses the attack on the French Protestants with Père Séguenud, 131-2; contemplates publishing his De Veritate, 132-3; prays for a sign from heaven, 133; prints the book, 134; is recalled from Paris, 135 and n.; is averse to the Spanish marriage, 136; seeks office, 138; is made Lord Castle-Island, 138; petitions Charles I., 139, 145; is harassed by creditors, 140; is made Lord Herbert of Cherbury, 140; joins the Council of War, 140; defends Buckingham in his Expedition of the Isle of Rhé, 141-2; writes on supremacy in the Church, 143; begins his Henry VIII., 143; discusses the matter with Panzani, 144; appeals to Charles I. for aid, 145; goes to York, 145-6; hesitates as to his part in the civil war, 147; lives at Montgoinery Castle, 148; corresponds with his brother Henry, 148-150; is threatened by the Long Parliament, 150; declines to help Prince Rupert in Wales, 151-2; surrenders Montgoinery Castle to the Parliamentary army under Middleton, 153-155; is besieged

- there by Royalists, 156; goes to London, 157; is pensioned by the Parliament, 157; revisits Paris, 158; makes his will, 159-161; dies, 161; his epitaphs on himself, 161-2; his successors and descendants, 165; his instructions at the French court, 186-188; his correspondence with Sir George More, 188-190; his correspondence as French ambassador, 190-201
- Herbert, Sir Edward, the lawyer, 5 and n., 14 n.
- Herbert, Edward (Lord Herbert's son), 23, 48, 144, 148, 160
- Herbert, Edward (Lord Herbert's grandson), third Lord Herbert of Cherbury, 148, 159-161 n., 163
- Herbert, Elizabeth, 9 n.
- Herbert, Elizabeth (sister of Lord Herbert), 10, 14 and n.
- Herbert, Elizabeth (Lord Herbert's cousin), 29 n.
- Herbert, Florence (Lord Herbert's daughter), 46 and n.
- Herbert, Florence (Lord Herbert's granddaughter), 160, 161 n.
- Herbert, Frances (sister of Lord Herbert), 10, 15-6
- Herbert, Frances (Lord Herbert's granddaughter), 160, 161 n.
- Herbert, George (uncle of Lord Herbert), 5 and n.
- Herbert, Sir George, of St. Julian's, 9 and n.
- Herbert, George, the poet (brother of Lord Herbert), 5 n., 10, 11 and n., 14 n., 140, 175
- Herbert, Sir George, of Swansea, 173
- Herbert, Sir Gerard, 102 n.
- Herbert, Sir Henry (brother of Lord Herbert), 10, 12 and n., 100, 140, 148-150, 160 n., 163, 194
- Herbert, Henry (Lord Herbert's grandson), 161
- Herbert, Henry Arthur, created Earl Powis, 4 n.
- Herbert, Jane (married Jenkin Lloyd), aunt of Lord Herbert's, 4 n.
- Herbert, John (Lord Herbert's grandson), 161 n.
- Herbert, Magdalen (Lord Herbert's mother), 9-10, 21, 23, 43, 175-179
- Herbert, Margaret (sister of Lord Herbert), 10, 14 and n.
- Herbert, Mary (Lord Herbert's wife), xiii., xiv., 22 and n., 23, 44; dies, 148
- Herbert, Mary (Richard Herbert's wife), 160
- Herbert, Mary (married T. Purcell), aunt of Lord Herbert's, 4 n.
- Herbert, Matthew (uncle to Lord Herbert), 4 and n., 29 n.
- Herbert, Oliver (cousin to Lord Herbert), 107, 154 n.
- Herbert, Philip, Earl of Montgomery and Pembroke, 112 n., 181
- Herbert, Sir Richard (of Colebrook), xix., 2
- Herbert, Sir Richard (Herbert's great-grandfather), 2, 5 and n., 6-8 and n.
- Herbert, Richard (Lord Herbert's father), 2-3 and n., 15 n., 21, 173
- Herbert, Richard (brother of Lord Herbert), 10, 11 and n.
- Herbert, Richard (Lord Herbert's son), second Lord Herbert of Cherbury, 23, 46, 148, 150, 160, 161
- Herbert, Thomas (brother of Lord Herbert), 10, 11 n., 12-14; appointed Captain of Dreadnought, 14 n.
- Herbert, Sir Thomas, travels of, 11 n.
- Herbert, Thomas (Lord Herbert's grandson), 161 n.
- Herbert, William, Earl of Pembroke (died, 1469), 2 n., 6 and n., 7, 9, 22
- Herbert, Sir William, of St. Julian's, 21 and n., 22 and n.
- Herbert, William (first Earl of Pembroke, 1551), 3 n., 4 n., 5 n., 49, 167, 170
- Herbert, William (brother of Lord Herbert), 10, 11 and n., 95
- Herbert, William (created Baron Powis, 1629), 70 and n., 140
- Herbert, William, third Earl of Pembroke (died, 1630), 77 n., 82 n., 112 and n., 140, 147
- Heurn, Jan van, 30 and n.
- Hill, Humphrey, 73
- Hilyard, Robert (Robin of Rededale), 8 n.
- Hippocrates, 30
- History of Henry VIII*, by Lord Herbert, xxxviii., 142

- Hoby, Sir Edmund, 70 n.
 Hoby, Lady, 70 and n.
 Holland, Earl of. See Rich.
 Horsemanship, 37 and n.
 Howard, Mr. Harry, 180
 Howard, Theophilus, Lord, of Walden, xiv.-xv., xx., 62 and n-66, 68, 180, 182-186
 Howard, Lady, of Walden, 65 and n.
 Howard, Lord Thomas, 72 n.
 Howell, quoted, 121-2 n.
 Hugon, Pierre, 194.
 Humphrey, Lord Stafford (Earl of Devonshire), 8 n.
 Hunting, 53
- Idea Medicinæ Philosophicæ*, 26 and n.
 Ireland, 72
 Isnard, 141
- JAMES I., xiii., xviii., xxii., 13, 42 n., 44, 59, 74, 96-7, 101, 103, 113, 114, 115, 117, 118-9, 123, 128-9, 130, 135-137, 138, 139, 179, 186-188, 190-192, 194, 195, 197-8
 Jannin, President, 116 and n., 195, 202.
 Jasper, Earl of Pembroke, 6-7 n.
 Jenkin, Thomas, 170
 Jennet (horse), 59-60 and n.
 Jesus College, Oxford, 160 and n.
 Johnson, Thomas, 31 n.
 Jones, Lady, of Abermarles, 50
 Jones, Sir Henry, of Abermarles, 14 and n.
 Jonson, Ben. xx. and n., xxxvi. n.
 Joseph, Captain, 12 and n.
 Juliers, xiv., 12 and n., 57, 60-62, 66, 76 n., 180
- KRITH, Sir Andrew, 180 and n.
 Kempe, 188
 Kensington, Lord, 134 n.
 Kent, Earl of, 45 n.
 Kerry, 138
 Kysarswert, 81
- LABROUE, Salomon, 40 and n., 52 and n.
 Lacon, Beatrice, 10 n.
 Lacon, Rowland, of Kinlet, 10 n.
 Langherac, Monsieur de, 101, 125, 202
 Languedoc, xvii., 86, 88, 93, 94
- Larkin, xv. n., 68
 Latimer, Lord, 8 n.
 Latin verse by Herbert, xxxviii., 16 and n.-19
 Laud, Archbishop, 144 and n.
 Lee of Lancashire, 15 and n.
 Lee, Roland, 6 n., 173
 Le Grand, Monsieur, 115 and n.
 Leicester, Earl of, 4 n., 84 n.
 Leigh, Alice, 84 n.
 Leigh, Sir Thomas, 84 n.
 Leland, Dr. John, xxxv.
 Lennox, Duke of, 74 and n., 128
 Lesdigueres, Duke of, 111 n.
 Library, Lord Herbert's, 160 and n.
 Lichfield, Bishop of. See Lee, Roland
 Lisle, Lord (Earl of Leicester), 70 and n.
 Llandinam, hills of, 4
 Llanaerfyl, 2 and n.
 Llanowthen, 46 n.
 Lloyd, Charles, 4 n.
 Lloyd, Griffith, 4 n.
 Lloyd, Jenkin, 4 n.
 Lloyd's Memoirs, quoted, 162 n.
 Llyssyn, 2 and n., 160
 Locke, John, his attack on Lord Herbert's philosophy, xxxv.; on education, quoted, 37 n.; on fencing, 38 n.; on riding, 41 n.
 Lockie, Nicholas, 68 n.
 Lorikin, Thomas, letter of, 37 n.
 Loty, Signior, 84
 Louis XIII., 99 n., 135, 137, 190-198, 199, 201
 Lucy, Sir Thomas, 58 and n., 59, 60, 68 and n., 147
 Ludlow, castle of, 171, 173
 Ludlow, 156
 Luynes, Monsieur de, xviii., xxi., 104 and n., 105, 116 and n., 118-120, 121 and n., 122 and n., 124, 191, 199, 200
 Lymore, 4 n., 5 n.
 Lyons, castle of (Holt Castle) 5 n.
 Lyons, 87, 88, 89, 94
- MACHYNLETH, 31 n.
 Madrid, 128, 130
 Mainwaring, Sir Henry, 98 n.
 Mainwaring, Philip, 140
 Mansel, Sir Rice, 173
 Mansel, Sir Robert, 13
 Mansel, Mr., 72
 Mansfeld, Count, 13 and n.
 Mantua, 125
 Margaret of Llandwenin, 170

- Margaret, Queen, of Valois, 56 and n., 57
 Maria, Empress, 130 and n.
 Mario de Medicis, Queen, 89 and n., 104 and n., 190-1, 193
 Markham, Gervase, quoted, 24 n.
 Marston Moor, 152
 Mary, Queen, 3
 Massinger, Philip, 182
 Master, Thomas, xxviii. and n.
 Mathematics, 27 and n.
 Maunsell, Dr., 160 n.
 Mayerne, Sir Theodor dc, 193
 Mead, Mr., quoted, 130 n.
 Medicine, 28-32
 Medici, house of, 82
 Meldrum, Sir John, 156
 Menon, Monsieur dc (= Menon, René de), 52 and n., 54, 102 and n., 106 and n.
 Mercatus, Ludovicus, 30 and n.
 Merlou, castle of, 48 and n., 52, 55, 203
 Merlou, town of, 53
 Middlemore, Mrs., 51 n.
 Middlesex, Earl of, 101 n.
 Middleton, Sir Thomas, 149, 150, 152-153 and n., 154 n., 155-157, 160, 163
 Milan, 85
Milium solis, 24 and n.
 Mitton, Colonel, 152, 156
 Mogul, the Great, 13 and n.
 Monat, 141
 Monk, Duke of Albemarle, 61 n.
 Monmouthshire, 22
 Monstreville, 102
 Montaigne, quoted, 180
 Montaterre, Baron de, 107
 Montausier, Duchess de, 90 n.
 Montgomery, 12 n., 46 n., 148 n., 149, 151, 153, 156, 157 n., 159, 160
 Montgomery, castle of, xx., 4, 5 n., 11 n., 23, 31 n., 46 n., 75, 141, 148, 149, 156, 158, 159, 160, 175
 Montgomery, church of, 3 n., 5, 6 and n., 10, 12 n., 14 n., 46 n., 148 and n.
 Montgomery, Lieut., 64, 65, 67
 Montgomery, Earl of. See Herbert, Philip
 Montmorency, Henri I., Duc dc, xiv., 40 and n., 48, 53, 54, 55, 66, 74, 75
 Montmorency, Henri II., Duc de, 93 and n., 94, 107, 193
 Moore, Sir Robert, 189
 More, Sir George, xx., 21 n., 188-190
 More, Sir Thomas, 143
 Morgan, Sir Charles, 77 and n., 185
 Morley, Sir John, 170
 Morley, Maud, 170
 Morrice, Mr. Henry, 190
 Mortlake, 22 n.
 Morton, Sir Albertus, 87 and n., 134 n.
 Mountjoy, Lord, 130 n.
 Murano, 82
 NACCARINE, 89 and n.
 Nassau, Prince Henry of, 108 and n., 191, 192
 Nassau, Count Maurice of, xvi., xvii.
 Naunton, Sir Robert, 193-197
 Nethersole, Sir Francis, 122, 123 n.
 Neuburg, Elector of, 76 n., 80
 Newark, 151
 New College, Oxford, 11
 Newmarket, 42 n.
 Newport, Francis, Earl of Bradford, 10 n.
 Newport, Sir Francis, xx., 10 and n., 21, 50, 54
 Newport, Magdalen. See Herbert, Magdalen.
 Newport, Margaret (Lord Herbert's grandmother), 9-10, 15 n., 20
 Newport, Sir Richard, 9 and n., 15 n., 88 and n.
 Newport, Richard, Lord, 10 n.
 Newton, Adam, 37 n.
 Newton, Edward, of Barley, Cheshire, 21 n.
 Newtown, 5 n., 153
 Northampton, 8 n.
 Northumberland, Earl of, 106
 Nottingham, Earl of, 46 and n.
 Novara, 85
 OFFLEY, Elizabeth, 12 n.
 Offey, Sir Robert, of Lincolnshire, 12 n.
 Old Exchange, 99 and n.
Olum Castoris, 24
 Omerfelde, 184, 185
 Orange, Prince of, 60 and n., 62, 95 and n.
 Ossory, Lord, 37 n.
 Ostend, 96
 Oswestry, 152, 153, 156, 157
 Ousely, Captain, 181
 Overbury's Characters, 6 n.
 Owen, Athelston, 29 and n.
 Owen, Jane, 5 n.

- Vercelli, 85
 Vere, Sir Francis, 61 n.
 Vere, Sir Horace, xiv., 11 n., 61
 and n., 63, 79
 Villers, Monsieur, 125
 Villiers, Sir George (Duke of Buckingham), xvii., xxii., 14 n., 98 and n., 101, 105, 122, 128, 138,
 139, 140, 141, 192, 199, 201
- WAKE, Sir Isaac, 124 and n.
 Wales, condition of, in sixteenth century, 171-174
 Wales, East, 5, 6 n.
 Wales, North, 5, 6 and n., 148, 149,
 150-152, 155
 Wales, West, 6 n.
 Walpole, Horace, quoted, xiii. n., xviii., xli., 34 n.
 Walsingham, Sir Francis, 174
 Walton, Isaak, quoted, 2 n., 10 n.,
 23 n., 175-177
 Warwick, Earl of, 8 n.
 Weldon, Sir Anthony, quoted, 113 n.
 Welshpool, 159
 Wexel, 78, 81,
 Whitehall, 71, 72
 Whitehall, paper chamber at, 5;
 chapel at, 44
- Whittingham, Edward, 46 n.
 Whittingham, Henry, 107
 Whittingham, William, 46 n.
 William I., 167
 Williams, Mr., 160 n.
 Willoughby, Sir Percigne, 181
 Wimbledon, Viscount. See Cecil,
 Sir Edward
 Windebank, secretary of state, 142, 145
 Wittingham, R., 149 n.
 Wodehouse, Colonel, 156
 Wolfgang, William. See Neuburg, Elector of Worcester, Earl of (Charles Somerset), 9 n., 22, 101 n.
 Worcester, Edward, Earl of, 101
 and n.
 Worcester, Henry, Earl of, 101 n.,
 170 and n.
 Wotton, Sir Henry, 81 and n., 124,
 142 and n.
 Wright, duellist, 181, 182
 Wroxeter, 9 n., 15 n.
- York, house of, 6 n.
- Zouch, Dr., 11 n.

